And now for the paid Fire Department, which is also a thing that has been under discussion for years, but which has, by the political strength of the fire laddies, been staved off till now. It is one of those moves which even those who oppose it know to be good. The firemen always oppose, tooth and nail, any alteration or improvement in the department, and yet when improvements are introduced accept them vigorously. Thus it was with steam fire engines, the first offer to introduce them having almost created a rupture in the department. They were received with derision and scorn, and prediction made that a few months would see their utter failure, but a few months found those who had been strongest in opposition petitioners to the Common Council that their old hand engines might be changed for steamers. And thus it will be with the new move that shall turn out the present system and give us something more approaching to the London Fire Brigade, who do not lose as much by fire in one year as the New York Department does in a month.

Among the odd exposés of the week is that of the Collectors of Internal Revenue, letting us into the secret of how much our rich men are worth. In the 8th district, which takes in a goodly part of 5th avenue, Madison square and like aristocratic localities, and a comfortable lot of the upper ten, the return foots up wonderfully. Only to think of Stewart, the drygoods man, owning up to an income of $1,843,637 per annum, and paying the Government a tax upon it of $92,181, while incomes rising $200,000 are plenty, and those of $100,000 and over as thick as blackberries. The lowest income noticed in that district runs over $20,000 per annum, and though only three Wards, the 18th, 20th and 21st, have paid as its war tax $2,196,582. In the 6th District the highest income assessed is that of Mr. William B. Astor, who is put down at $838,525 per annum. Heretofore Mr. Astor has always been quoted the richest man in America, but if this exposition be true, he cannot hold a candle to A. T. Stewart, the drygoods man. We fear this income tax publication will make some sore heartburning among the shoddies.

Speaking of rich men reminds us that the United States Senate, on Tuesday last, appropriated $3,000 to get up a gold medal for Commodore Vanderbilt, in acknowledgment of patriotic services. We presume this is to pay for the steamer he presented, and for those he bought for Government without charging brokerage.

Our Amusements.

What shall we say about the theatres when there is really nothing to say? No novelty has been produced within the memory of the oldest inhabitant, and yet when we stroll into the various houses we find them always full, sometimes uncomfortably so.

The only thing for weeks in the way of novelty is the Irish drama of "The Shamrock" at Niblo's, and though we have sworn perpetual enmity to that style of Irish drama, yet in self-defence we are obliged to say something about it, therefore will we acquit our conscience by giving its plot and so letting it go.

There is, in the first place, a small family by the name of O'Hara living upon the estate of Sir Richard Mountjoy in the far-famed county of Galway, and who are deeply in debt to the said landlord. The said landlord has a son, Ernest Mountjoy, who ruins Eveleen O'Hara, and afterwards speaks of her slightingly, in which he is overheard by her brother Charlie, who straightway gives him a thrashing which is supposed at the time to have killed him. He is carried unconscious to O'Hara's house, and Sir Richard attempts the arrest of Charlie, but is frustrated by one Pat Molloy, who conceals him in the Fairy Dell. To this same place comes Eveleen, with her child, for concealment lest her father shall discover her shame. There also comes Lord Calfton, an English nobleman, attracted by the sound of her voice singing to the baby, and flying from whom, Eveleen leaves her youngster to the cold charities of the rocks. At this moment Eveleen's younger sister Kate, enters the dell, meets Lord Calfton, who attempts to kiss her, but is overhauled by Charlie and forcibly rebuked. The next person on the scene is Maggie McGuire, who comes to bring food for Charlie. She hears the cry of the baby, finds, and is surprised by Pat Molloy while caressing it, and accused by Pat with being its mother. A pleasant little row here arises, which is all made right by Maggie, and the two agree to adopt the child and call it Shamrock. Charlie soon makes his escape to America, and Eveleen recovers her child and is afterwards induced by Lord Calfton to go to London, where she—of course in a virtuous way—resides at his mansion in St. James's square. Here she meet Ernest Mountjoy, who comes to dine with Lord Calfton when she has been a year in London.

At this juncture Charlie returns from America to bring out his family and finds his pursuer, Sir Richard, dead, his father a lunatic, and his sister living with Calfton. Next scene in London at Calfton's, where he meets Ernest and proposes to shoot him according to the code, but before the matter can be arranged he finds out that Eveleen is about to be married to Ernest, who having become convinced that she is living with Lord Calfton all in a virtuous way, still loves her and makes a square offer, which naturally winds up the whole thing according to Gunter, under which circumstances we really cannot say anything more in a dramatic way this week.

THE PRISON PEN AT MILLEN, GA., AS IT APPEARED PREVIOUS TO THE ARRIVAL OF GEN. SHERMAN'S ARMY.—FROM A SKETCH BY LIEUT. T. A. PRIME.

IN MEMORIAM.

[Lieut. John S. Hyer, of Utica, had served with distinction, for nearly three years, in the United States Artillery, and had passed through many battles unharmed. On the night of May 20th, while engaged in transporting the battery under his command from Memphis Landing to the White River, he was fatally wounded in the stomach, and was drowned. His remains were afterwards recovered, and were interred in his native city.—Ed.]

We wrapped him in the flag he loved,
The flag he died to save,
And gave him to his peaceful rest,
The chamber of the grave;
And tears, from eyes unused to weep,
Upon the bier were shed,
Where fallen in his martial shroud,
Lay the young hero dead.

On fields of honor oft he stood
Amid the battle's din,
And fought as only heroes fight,
A nation's pride to win—
As patriots fight, with heart and hand,
Who hold a sacred trust,
To keep that country's heathenish bright,
Her banner from the dust.

But oh, he died not in the van,
As soldiers love to die!
The cannon's breath upon his brow,
Their smoke his canopy—
With the glad sounds of victory
The last he saw in life,
A vision of the starry flag,
His dying eye to cheer;

But in the darkness, on his soul
The final order fell,
From that fatal captain over all,
Who "ordereth all things well."
"No more through blood, and storm, and fire,
Thy way, my son, shall be,
But through the surging waves," he said,
"Arise and follow me."

And oh, in faith, believe that He
Who o'er the waters trod
Is still the same Almighty friend,
The same Omniscient God,
That in the heroic mortal stirs,
With high and holy thought,
The love of country, and of peace,
The loving voice of Galilee
Spoke all the storm to peace;

That though alone in solemn might,
Your darling sank to doom,
And received eternal glory's gate
By path of silent gloom,
His seraph soldier, taking him
Upon the farther shore,
Folded the soldier in her arms,
His toils for ever o'er.

Long shall his memory live to be
By loving hearts cherished,
And long his tomb with freshest flowers
By loving hands be twined;
Long shall his valiant deeds be told,
By loving lips be told,
His name on glory's deathless page
In triumph be enrolled.

CHAPTER VI.—THE END OF THE WORLD.

THE sun was low when Francis Tredethlyn left the Crown Inn, and walked slowly up the village street. The sun was burning, and only a cool grey glory flickered here and there upon the quaint old casements. The young man walked slowly, looking about him with a half doubtful, half bewildered gaze, like a man who sees his native village in a dream. And indeed no village in the vision of a sleeper could be more tranquil in its quiet repose than this Cornish street, steep and stony, mounting to the summit of a hill, upon whose top the great gaunt church loomed grim and gigantic, stately, like the entrance to an ogre's castle in fairyland. You climbed the steep little street; and you came to the top of a hill, and behold, there and that was all. The village ended here; and there was nothing for you to do but to go back again. It was the centre of the world, the hub, and finding a great Elizabethan door of ponderous oak and iron barred against any chaotic realm that might lie beyond our everyday earth.

There may have been occasions—indeed, the inhabitants of Landredashe would have testified to many occasions which those ponderous doors swung open on their mighty hinges; but the ignorant traveller, looking at them shut, found it difficult to realise the possibility of their ever being opened. They looked like the doors of a mausoleum which may open once in half a century to admit the embalmed dead, but can never be unclosed for any meaner purpose. Grim towers flanked the stony arch on either side, and two old rusty cannon pointed their iron noses within the shadow of the towers, ready to fire a volley down the hilly street whenever the simple folks of Landredashe should evince any sedititionary tendencies.

To the right of the great gates there was a handsome wing of solid masonry, whose Tudor windows opened upon a square courtyard, where there were more cannon, and upon a prim, old-fashioned garden, shut in by a high wall, and only visible to the wanderer through the iron rails and arabesques of a lofty gate, amidst whose scrollwork the arms of the Landredashe and Trevorbyns, the Courtenays and Polwhiles, were interlaced and entangled.

The garden wall bounded the estate of Rashleigh Vyvyan Trevaunence, Marquis of Landredashe, and beneath the shelter of that old, ivy-covered, red brick wall lay the churchyard, quiet and shadowy, dark with the dense foliage of great yew trees, thick with long tangled grass, that grew high amongst the sharing headstones. Francis Tredethlyn stopped by the low wooded gate, and leaning against the monumental pillar that supported it, looked up at the square towers which seemed like stony sentinels for ever keeping guard over the entrance to Landredashe. The light was red upon the tower window that faced the western sky, but all the other casements stared blankly and dark; and upon the arch of the great doorway, and the empty village street, in which one woman, toiling slowly upwards with a pitcher of water that slopped and trickled at intervals upon the pavement, was the only living presence.

"The great gates look just the same as they used to look," thought Francis Tredethlyn. "When I was a boy, and read fairy tales, I always fancied that the enchanted castle the wandering prince came to in the middle of a wood, or on the summit of a precipice, was like Landredashe, with its seaside standing all alone in the middle of the way, with no road to the right nor the left, so that the prince must go in and ask shelter, though he knew that harm would come of it, or else go back and lose all the trouble of his journey. How I used to feel as I read that bell when I was a lad!" thought Francis, looking at the iron ring which swung from a massive chain on one side of the archway.

"But I've no need to dawdle here," he thought, as he pushed the gate open and went into the churchyard. "It seems as if the sooner I get to the place where I am certain to hear the truth about Susan, the more I dread hearing it."

The general traveller who ought to turn away from the great gates of Landredashe to descend the hill under the impression that the scenery of Cornwall came to an abrupt conclusion on the threshold of the marquis's domain, would have been mistaken. There were other and higher lands, broad stretches of hill and meadow land beyond the churchyard, to the right of the quaint old garden and the gothic towers and casements; and it was thitherward that Francis Tredethlyn directed his steps. He crossed the churchyard, only pausing briefly before one tombstone, upon which the sunbeam shed a brilliant light. Rashleigh Lyn were cut, low down on the stone, at the bottom of a long list of Tredethlyns, who lay buried in this churchyard. The young man had been told that of the solemn precinct by a little rusty iron gate that opened on a broad expanse of common land sloping upwards to the sea, the sweeper's gift, and broken here and there by a quarry or a patch of water.

"It looks bleak and barren enough," thought Francis, with a shudder; "but it's hereabouts that my uncle Oliver picked up a spot of his money. I'm not sure that one of those pools of stone quarry in the hollow there brought him in plenty, if folks tell the truth."

Francis Tredethlyn had often been echoed the boast of Helen Macgregor had been chosen, and with stronger justification than that lady, for the earth upon which she trod not only lay over her head, but his own peculiar property, by virtue of certain yellow-looking parchments under the sign-manual of an Earl and Baroness of Landredashe, bestowed in the reign of James I., and by payment of an eccentric annual tribute in the shape of a young lamb and a hundredweight of potatoes. It was on his own, this bleak waste land which Francis Tredethlyn, like private soldier in her Majesty's service, late and early, was accustomed to see stretched under his feet. Nor was it the less to be considered for its barrenness of aspect: for rich metals lay deep beneath its hundreds of acres of unprofitable surface, and the wretched tenants of the land were amongst the oldest and most valuable in Cornwall.

But Francis Tredethlyn was in no wise elated or disturbed by the importance of his possession. He had never felt any ardent desire for wealth, and was quite content to live upon his small but solid advantages. He saw the effect of his fortune upon other men, and smiled at their weakness; and he saw the loneliness of it, and sighed at it; but his altered position was true of him now—he had no power either to realise or rejoice in the extent of his riches.

He walked slowly across the barren moorland, always upward, always mounting towards a long ridge of land, on the other side of which he knew that the light stretched low against the darkening sky—a bleak, bare-looking hill, that seemed the very last place in the world where it could be fancied that Tredethlyn Grange had been built four centuries ago, in the days when men built their houses with a view to defence—and yet stood there still, a long gray tenement of moss-grown stone, with narrow casement windows, looking dark, blind, and unpenetrable. The larger portion of the old manor had been uninhabited during the tenantship of the Tredethlyns, who, in spirit of economy, had located themselves in the inferior wing that lay at one end of the rambling mansion. It was in one of these rooms that a light now twinkled faintly, and it was towards the end of the long house that Francis Tredethlyn directed his steps. There had been a garden once before the Grange, and an old stone sundial still marked the spot; but the flower-beds were choked up and gravel paths there remained no vestige now. A field of turfed, bounded by a low stone wall, lay between two tumbledown pillars that had once supported a pair of handsome gates, and the sheep browsed close beneath the dim latticed windows.

"It seems like the end of the world to me to-night," thought Mr. Tredethlyn; "and yet once it was comfortable and homelike enough, when I ran with Susy of a night by the fire in the kitchen, while she darned the old man's gray worsted stockings. And to think that he had such oceans of money all that time, and yet seemed almost to grudge his only child every gown she wore and every bit of bread she put into her mouth."

The young man was close to the familiar threshold by this time. He knocked at a low, narrow door in the neighborhood of the one dimly-lighted window, and then drew back a few paces, looking up at the old-fashioned casements.

"There is the window of Susy's room," he thought. "How black and dark it looks to-night! I remember coming up here the night before I ran away from Landredashe to enlist. I remember standing by the low wall yonder, in the cold autumn night, looking up at that very window, and wondering if I were turning then, and I thought of how I should see it burning just the same when I came back, and how I'd throw a handful of gravel at the pane of window, and Susy would look out, startled and wondering, to find her faithful sweetheart come back to her from the end of the world. And here's this place that we know like the end of the world, somehow, and I'm every bit as far from Susy now as ever I was out yonder."

The door was open only a very little way, and a woman's face, so hard and angular that it seemed almost to cut into the dusky atmosphere, peered out at the traveller.

"What do you please to want, sir?" she asked, suspiciously.

"I want to ask you a few questions, Martha Dryscoll. I've come from the antipodes to ask them."

"Mr. Tredethlyn!" cried the woman, opening the door to its widest extent; "Mr. Francis Tredethlyn—come back to us like a ghost in the night! I make so bold as to bid you welcome, sir. Your uncle's empty chair stands ready for you. The house seems strange and lonesome without him."

It was not everybody who would have searched for a kindly welcome in the harsh voice or ominous bone with the smallest ray of cheerfulness, or brighten any fireside with so much as the faintest reflection of light. But Martha Dryscoll spoke in all good faith. She had believed in her master, and had worked for him, and pinched for him, and hid articles of food and other people's property, throughout five-and-thirty-years of the dreariest and hardest life that woman ever endured. She had starved, and slaved, and scrubbed, dying upon a high road near one of his outlying farms, and had taken her from cold labor and all its attendant pains to be his housekeeper and house-slave; and she had repaid this favor a thousandfold by a devotion that knew no weariness, and a rigid economy that extended itself to the smallest of a group of salt in the old spindle-legged leaden saltcellars.

Oliver Tredethlyn had not been actuated by any qualities so fine in this eccentric choice of a servant. He took his housekeeper from the wayside because he saw in her a slyness that would suit his own, and a face and figure, which would have been sufficiently alarming on one of King Frederick William's chosen grenadiers. He had been selected still more for the cruel answers to his art questions, in which she told him that she had walked thirty miles that day before lying down, and she believed, for one; that she had walked twenty miles the day before, and five-and-twenty the day before that; that she had contested food for the dogs and cats and horses, and that she had worked in the fields and lived upon an average of twopence a day ever since she remembered anything.

It was upon this that a bargain was struck between Oliver Tredethlyn, of Tredethlyn Grange, on the one part, and Martha Blank, Martha Anybody, of the other part, for the poor creature had no knowledge of any special surname to which she might lay claim, and had been called Carpenty Jane in one place, because her hair was red and her name was not Jane. She had been called twenty Mrs. Jones in as many places, on account of her abnormal height; but the name she had received in the Union Where her earlier years had been passed was Martha, and it was this name which she herself recognised as her legitimate appellation. She went home with Oliver Tredethlyn as one of his empty wagons, and ate her first spare meal in the Grange kitchen before nightfall; and from that hour until the old man's death she served him well and faithfully, she lived with him all the days of his bachelorhood, and resignedly united herself to his fallen when he committed the folly of marriage. Faithful remained Mr. Tredethlyn's wife when he took it into his head to bring home a small female servant from the workhouse, and she had been faithful into a marriage with a man whom she detested; and, faithful and untiring to the last, this rough, hard-handed woman had watched by the young wife's sick-bed during those dull years in which she slowly withered, and faded, from a fresh, blooming girl into a prematurely old woman, and so sank by lingering stages into an early grave, leaving behind her one only child, whose birth had been the cause of her baptism. If no softer light than such as might be shed from the grim, grenadier-like affection of Martha Dryscoll

Jonathan Dryscoll, the farm bailiff whom Oliver Tredethlyn had desired his housekeeper to marry, was twenty years younger than his wife, and was a poor and weak a creature morally and physically in her hands that he seemed at least half a century her junior. As a child he was overlooked, he said it. If she told him to think anything, he thought it, or would have done so, if the mental exercise had not been generally beyond the scope of his faculties. He was ashamed and faithful as Martha herself; but if Martha had told him to go and fire all the ricks on Oliver Tredethlyn's property, he would have done it with the blind trustfulness of a princess in a child's story-book, who obeys the eccentric behests of a fairy godmother. That Martha could do anything wrong, or think anything wrong, was an hypothesis which Jonathan her husband had never comprehended. Perhaps the pleasantest thing about this couple was that there was no discreasable evidence of Martha's authority. Indeed, that worthy woman was most punctilious in respect to her liege lord and husband, whom she always spoke of as "the master." Jonathan obeyed and trembled, but the secret which his wife wielded was an invisible one, and the chains that bound her slave were as imperishable as if they had been fashioned of cobwebs.

Martha Dryscoll was not ashamed on the her capacity of expressing any species of emotion; but some faint ray of pleasure kindled in her grim face as she considered Francis Tredethlyn through the lattice of an apartment that had served as a kind of state chamber for three generations of his race. She set the candle on the polished mahogany table, and, folding her arms, contemplated the new master of the Grange at her leisure. In that dim light, in her quaint, scanty dress, with a brown background of oaken panel behind her, she looked like a homely figure in one of Jan Steen's pictures, a hard-faced, angular housewife, honest, laborious and economical, with her arm perpendicular upon to the leaking of beer-barrels or the baling over of soap-bubbles, her eye ever on the alert to perceive waste or extravagance.

"I wish you welcome, Mr. Tredethlyn," she said; and then, with something like sadness in her tone: "If the master was to go away from here, better that it should go to you than to strangers. I don't think you'll turn your back upon her if she was to need your help, would you, now, Mr. Francis?"

"Turn my back upon her!" cried the young man. "I turn my back upon my cousin Susan! Do you think that I want the money that ought to have been hers? With Gods blessing, I will go the end of the world to find her and bring her back. But tell me—tell me all about it, Martha. I know you are a good creature. I know you were fond of Susan, though you seemed hard with her during the old man. Tell me all you know about my lost cousin, and don't fear but I'll make good use of my knowledge."

"It isn't much I have to tell, sir," answered the housekeeper, very gravely. "You remember old Mr. Restwick, of Cornhill, sir? He was a friend to the master almost as rich as our master was. However it is, he and master was always fast friends; and when Mrs. Restwick died, and her little one was only a month, he and master seemed to get friendlier than ever, and was always having their heads together about something or other, and talking about this place, and sitting in our kitchen and in the very room—for master made quite a free with the old man—and would sit in the parlor on his account—all the summer time. Miss Susan used to like the old man, but she durstn't say as much, seeing as he was her father's friend. Restwick looks down upon me knows, Mr. Francis, that the real reason of old Restwick pottering about our premises was to get a chance of seeing my friend, no more than if it had been so much Greek or Latin. But one night, one quiet summer evening, after such a long spell of fine weather as could set at once, and it came upon Susan Tredethlyn, as it came upon me—like a thunderbolt. Can you guess what it was, Mr. Francis?"

"No!" exclaimed the young man, staring at Martha Dryscoll with a bewildered expression on his face.

"Nor any one else, Mr. Francis, that wasn't so wrapped up in the love of his money that the very heart inside him had turned to stuff as hard as the golden guineas, or harder; for there's some kind of harness as will melt them, isn't there, Mr. Francis? It's the night I am telling you of, my master told Susan the meaning of old Restwick's visits. She was to marry him, poor, pretty young thing. He'd promise to make over all and each settlements to Susan, master called 'em, and she'd be mistress of Fen Gorbold farm, and one of the richest women in this part of the country. The poor dear never opened her eyes, Mr. Francis, and fell down upon the floor at her father's feet as white and as quiet as a corpse."

"Oh! what villains!" cried Francis, pacing up and down the room. "The infernal villains!"

She didn't lie there long; she wasn't let to do that. Mr. Tredethlyn lifted her up by the arm, and set her on her feet, fierce and savage-like; and when she opened her eyes, and looked about her, all stupified and bewildered, he began to talk to her. It was cruel talk to hear from a father to his daughter, and cruel right he was to be angry and shaving, and only held from falling by his hard hand clenched upon her arm. I tried to interfere myself, Mr. Francis, but your master let his daughter drop into a chair, and pushed me out of the room. Me and Jonathan was sleeping in the loft over the stables then, and Miss Tredethlyn took me by the shoulders, and put me out of the door that opens from the kitchen into the yard at the back. I heard her lock and bolt it against me, and I knew I could be no help or comfort to that poor child all night. The door's thick, and I knew master was strong and savage when now and then, like as if they had been blown towards me on the winds, and her father's voice speaking to her in a way that I listened till all seemed quiet, and I was in hopes his heart was softened towards her. But when I got up at four o'clock next morning—for I always knew that was the very busy—Susan Tredethlyn's room was empty, and the front door was unlocked and unbolted. She's run away, Mr. Francis; she'd left her own home time in the night, and run away. There was a little scrap of a shawl she used to wear hanging to the latch of the door. That was bad news for me to tell my master, Mr. Francis, but I had to tell it. He turned white, and glared at me for a minute just like a wild beast, and there was a choking, gurgling kind of noise in his throat as if he was as quiet after that one minute as if he'd been made of iron. So much the better

Mrs. Drysc oll," he said; "an undutiful daughter isn't worth the mead she'll have."

"But he went after her," said Francis, "surely he made some attempt to bring her back? He didn't let a poor ignorant girl go out into the world without a friend—without a sixpence?"

"She had a little money, Mr. Francis. Her father had given her a sovereign on her birthday every year for the last ten years, making her promise to save the money. She had saved the money, for she had not the heart to spend it, poor child; at the stock that money with her, for when I looked about her room, I missed the little box she used to keep it in, and I'm sure sorry for her. Mr. Tredethlyn never stirred hand or foot to do it, though I went on my bended knees to him, begging and praying for a sovereign or two for me. So to me, Mr. Francis, I'm but a poor ignorant country-woman, that never learned to read and write till I was grown up, but I'm sure that I got my husband to go to Falmouth with an advertisement for the county paper, saying as 'S. T. was to remember my child's true friend in M. D., and was to be sure and write to her whenever she wanted help. I daresn't say more, sir, and I think when master saw that advertisement he knew that it meant, for he glared at me across the paper, just as he glared at me when I told him his daughter was gone."

"And he never relented—he never softened towards that poor unhappy girl?"

For three years and more I never mentioned her name. Night after night he'd sit and write, and make out his accounts, and calculate his profits, and rub his hands, and talk to me fast enough about the business of the farm; but he never spoke his daughter's name. One day he got a letter, directed in her hand. I took it from the postman at Landredale myself, one afternoon when I was down there marketing, and I wrote down the paper and the letter, but that was all I ever knew of the letter. When my master saw the hand, he came over all of a tremble like, and there was something in the sight of that poor stern old man trembling and shivering like as if he'd been stricken with the palsy, but he got over it in a minute, and read the letter, me standing by him all the time. If his face had been stone it couldn't have told less. He crumpled up the letter and put it in his pocket, for the three months he never spoke of that, nor of his daughter. Yet I knew somehow that he thought of her, for a kind of change came over him, and he seemed always brooding, brooding, brooding; and he'd start up all of a sudden when we was all sitting of a night quiet in the parlour—just as if he'd say as if he was going right away, and then heave a long sigh and sit down again. But he never said anything about what was in his thoughts, till one morning I came to him, and said very quietly, 'Pack me some clothes in a carpet-bag, Mrs. Drysc oll. I'm going to London, to look for my daughter.' My husband and him went to the town on Landredale, to catch the Falmouth coach, but our master never came back. The next news as we heard of him, Mr. Francis, came to us a fortnight after he'd left. It was a letter from the lawyers to say as Mr. Oliver Tredethlyn was dead."

"And is that all?"

"Yes, Mr. Francis, I can tell you no more. My master was a good master to me, and I grieved him dutifully when I went to leave his service. But things have all seemed to come before me in a new light since that night when I saw Susan Tredethlyn's face white and cold in her father's arms, and him without pity for her. It seems as if I'd been stone blind up to that time, Mr. Francis; my eyes was opened all of a sudden, and I see that we'd been all wicked heathens, making an idol out of money that had never brought happiness or comfort to us, and never can, least of all to ourselves. I saw it all at once that night, Mr. Francis, and I knew that our lives had been wrong somehow."

Martha Drycoll spoke very earnestly. She was a good woman, after her own manner, eager to do her duty to her neighbor, and yet for many years, faithful and affectionate. A noble heart beat in that greasible-like form, a gentle spirit looked out of those dull eyes. She was told the story of her young mistress's flight with a sorrowful solemnity, undisturbed by tears. Perhaps her hard childhood, her long years of toiling, her joyless life had dried up the source of that tender womanly emotion—for Martha Drycoll had never been seen to shed a tear, even when she had a terrible cold in the head, and had pocketed a grim-looking workbox, and took from it a little pocketbook, out of which she tore a leaf.

"There's the name of the lawyer on the paper, Mr. Francis," she said, handing the paper to Mr. Tredethlyn.

The young man read the word Coltonslough.

"Coltonslough," he repeated, "I never heard of a place of that name. But I'll find it, if it's the most obscure spot on the earth. Good-bye, Martha Drycoff, for I hohope you're a good woman."

He laid out his hand, and grasped the housekeeper's bony fingers as he spoke.

"We've been a waiting—me and the mare—for orders from you this hour and more, sir, but as we're ready to serve you faithful, if you want our service; but we're ready to leave the old place, if we're not going on upon you. You'll be coming to settle here, maybe?"

"No," answered Francis Tredethlyn, with something of a sigh, "I'll leave it to my cousin Russel here, who thought to find her, I should have been glad enough to settle somewhere in these parts. As it is, I shortly purchase a commission in the army, and see the heartache, and I doubt if I shall ever come near it again. Whatever wages you and your husband had in my uncle's time shall be doubled from to-night, Mrs. Drycoll; and if my cousin Susan is still alive, and should ever find her way back to this place, I should like her to see a light burning in the old window, and to find a faithful friend ready to bid her welcome home."

Francis Tredethlyn did not linger very long in the house where a great part of his boyhood had been spent. Martha's abundance in provisions, resulting very strongly of perfumes and stable, and the two would fain have given Mr. Tredethlyn a detailed account of their stewardship; but the young man had no heart to listen to them. What did it matter to him that he was the poorer by the death of an Alderney cow on the pasture farm down in the valley, or the failure by a crop of barley-shearing season on the hill? He came home to find no creature of his life on him. He stood as a stranger in the house where Eve was born, and created to hear him company; and he felt very lonely and desolate in spite of his thirty thousand a year.

He walked back to Landredale across the bleak moorland under the still summer night. Away in the distance the dim lights of Coltonslough seemed melting imperceptibly into purple sky; and vague and dim as that shadowy distance seemed to the mistress of the Grange. Eve was there, she slept at the Crown, and left Landredale early the next morning by the Falmouth coach, journeying London-ward; but of her own means abandoned his search for Susan Tredethlyn.

CHAPTER VII.—MADE HILLARY'S ADDRESS.

From the bleak moorland on the Cornish hills, where no tree can flourish, and where the sweeping breadth of the autumn winds makes a music of its own, and makes the quick sheep walk again as they look occasward, from the hilly district beyond Landredale, the richest and the poorest in the world, and is at any rate the finishing-point of this British Isle, to the valley of the Thames, the shepherd and shepherdess must travel over the broad heights about the Star and Garter is about as great a change of scene as all England can afford. It is like the transition from the wild grandeur of some which has done duty for the blasted heath near Forres, whereon Macbeth met the witches, to the fine days when Mr. Charles Kean played the ambitious Thane, to reveal a glimpse of fairyland fresh from the pencil of Mr. Beverley, with distant castles overlooking the valleys of the country, the verdant valleys, and forest trees reflected in the calm bosom of a lake.

Mr. Hillary was living in a sheltered bend of the river, near to Isleworth than to Twickenham, a spot where the trees grew thicker and the shadows fell darker as the river flowed on. Here the scenery was less often heard than higher up the river. Mr. Hillary's house and Mr. Hillary's garden seemed to belong to the river, and to the broad verdant nook along the river bank. It was called the Cedars, and it was a very old place, as any house so called must be, and it was full of cedars by virtue of the great trees whose spreading branches made patches of dense shadow on the lawn; and also by virtue of the cedar-pencils, who christens his shelterless houses indifferently after the noblest trees of the forest. The house was an old-fashioned mansion, long and low and irregular; and there was a kind of window devoted for the admission of the light of heaven, and there was a species of cobbled devised by ingenious workmen for the exhibition of daylight when it become obnoxious, which did not adorn and diversify the glowing crimson of the façade, and which was known as bow-windows. Broad windows of violet-stained glass, tiny diamond-paned casements and noble jutting-out bays, "oriel" in architectural phraseology, with their dais; striped linen blinds of crimson and white, and Venetian shutters of dazzling green; windows looking into conservatories, and windows looking into aviaries—all combined to bewilder the eye of the stranger who stood upon the lawn by the river looking up at the cedar-shaded house.

Perhaps there never had been anywhere else so many flowers, and birds, and goldfish, and pet dogs collected together in one spot as in the old half acree. Banks of parti-colored blossoms blazed in the sunshine of the lawn, fir shone like blue lightning in the gentle air, and the sun shone on a cap day; marble busts of insipid water, and airy trickling fountains twinkled and glittered in the grey distance. A fragile aviary of delicate ironwork, overlaying with jessamine and clematis, honeysuckle and myrtle blossom, led away to flowery nooks and shady terrace in the grove; and what with the perfume of a million flowers, the gurgling of blackbirds and thrushes, the sounding of fairy harps, the soft murmur of a grove of canaries, the cooing of tropical lovebirds, the screaming of parroquets and the barking of pet-lap-dogs carefully kept, the stranger who suddenly let loose in Mr. Hillary's riverside Eden, was apt to yield himself up for the moment to a state of confusion and bewilderment.

The place was in itself bewildering enough for the ordinary mind; without Miss Hillary—without Miss Hillary! But when Miss Hillary appeared, standing out of a drawing-room window with diamonds dragons of white and blue fluttering and spreading round her, and with all manner of yellow gold, and purple enamel absurdities dangling at her wrists and depending from the embroidered breast of her cambric pinafore, then the stranger who was not provided with forty thousand a year and a coronet, the which to lay at the feet of the adorable young creature who weakest of fools if he did not take to his boots, there and then, and fly from the Cedars, never to return thither, but to wander about Middlesex and Kent. If, looking at Maude Hillary, and knowing that he could never hope to win her for his own, he did not straightway flee from that dowery paradise beside the sunlit river, all after agonies endured by his luckless heart were only the natural consequence of his unmanly pusillanimity, but, unhappily, there are so many mad men in the world. Hounbury and Baden-Baden are dangerous places, but there are crowds of dolorful creatures who will haunt the dazzling halls of the Kursaal, and the elegant saloons of M. Benazet, so long as the fatal wheel revolves and the croupier cries:

"Make your game, gentlemen, the game is made."

What can be a more absurd spectacle than a big blundering noodle whistling and fluttering about the flame of a candle? Yet the incarnation of moth A will not be accepted as a warning by moth B, though he may be a witness of the exercise. Younger men, and fairer features, coming a fluctuating income by the exercise of their talents in light literature; artists; curates, with hopes of rich preferment, come and saw, and were conquered. The man who, being a bachelor and under thirty years of age, beheld Maude Hillary and was not in love with her, was made of stercor stuff than the rest of his race, and must have had in him the material for a Cromwell or a Napoleon. Maude Hillary was a perfectly incorruptible, libless creature, intended to hold iron sway over his fellow-men; and had no business in the paradise between Isleworth and Twickenham.

Shall I describe Maude Hillary as she sate across the lawn on the morning I'm sure she would say, as applied to this young lady's movements, advisedly, for there was a swimming, undulating motion in her walk, which was apt to remind one of a lovely white-sailed yacht gliding far out across an expanse of serene blue water on a summer's day. "Shall I describe her? No; if I do, stern critics will tell me that she is a very commonplace young person after all, when it is only by description of the most commonplace. Her complexion was specially fair and bright; but it was not because of her fair skin that she was beautiful. Her features were delicate and harmonious, but those who admired her most could scarcely have told you whether her nose was Grecian or Roman, or whether the Bourbon type—whether her forehead was low or high, her chin round or pointed. She was bewitching, rather than beautiful. Men of people saw her, and in spite of purely technical grounds, a thousand lovely English women might have disputed the prize with her, and would not. I think Paris would have wished to give her the apple, if only for the pleasure of seeing her bright face light up into one of her sunny smiles, or of her tuneful voice, though in strict justice he might feel himself obliged to bestow the fruit elsewhere. Miss Hillary was a favorite with people saw her, and fell in love with her, and bowed themselves down at her feet, long before they had time to find out that she was also a most beautiful artist.

She came winking in about amongst the flowerbeds now, and bobsok herself towards an open French window in the basement of the house, a temple of slender marble columns, entwined with ivy and beautiful ephemeral parasites, whose blossoms were remarkable for color rather than fragrance. Two gentlemen, who were disporting themselves with lawn billiards, deserted that amusement and advanced to meet the goddess. They were slowly enough, because they held it vulgar to be in a hurry, and they were very young, very much dressed, and very much encumbered with ornaments of this earth; but they were over head and ears in love with Miss Hillary notwithstanding.

One of the gentlemen was Lionel Hillary. He had for her constant associates from four to half a dozen pet dogs, and Miss Julia Desmond, her friend and companion, who was by no means the despised companion so popular in three-volume novels. She was a very dignified young lady, very handsome, very much colored in eye so many different strikes. She was one of the Desmonds of Castle Desmond, near Limerick, and there was something about her family in say nothing of one extinct earldom, forfeited by reason of high treason on the part of its possessor, the attainder of which, after the fact, had been the lifelong dream of Patrick Macmanara Ryan O'Brien Desmond, until death let fall a curtain over the unfinished page of delusions which had survived unchanged and changeless to the last in the eternal boyhood of an Irishman's nature.

Julia was a very dignified young lady, and had a fine Irish brogue, and a Parisian accent, which whence she had returned to the south of Ireland, to find the impress of decay upon every object around her. The grand old mansion of the Desmonds, the cottages in the lane below the castle boundary to the shattered figure of the brave old colonel, who had fought under the banner of his father's dethroned, to which Lionel Hillary, his oldest friend and largest creditor, was summoned by an impassioned letter from the old colonel. To Mr. Hillary the old man confided his penniless daughter. He had nothing to leave her but a set of old-fashioned ornaments which had belonged to her mother, and to which he fondly alluded as the "family jocks" he had nothing to leave her but the title and the tumpery; and he would have given upon all the money lent him by his friend, had he ever lived to return the principal. Mr. Hillary was under a kind of obligation to him. However it was, the London merchant promised to be a friend and protector to Julia Desmond, and when she was the colonel's funeral was over carried her back to London with him, and established her in his own house, as the companion of his daughter. A young lady more or less was of little consequence in such an establishment as the Cedars, so the merchant thought when he made the offer; but Miss Desmond, and Maude Hillary was delighted to have a friend who was fo be her perpetual companion; a friend and companion who was prepared for the third in that delicious glee. The two girls drove together, and walked together, and rode together; and played duets on one piano and on two pianos, or a harp and piano; and went out together to make waterecker sketches of their favorite nooks in the river, with very blue water and very green willows, and a man in a scarlet jacket lazily pushing a ferryboat away from the shore, and a Newfoundland dog, very black and white and spotty, lying on the bank.

NEW BOOKS.

The Atlantic Monthly. This periodical still holds on its course of its old American monthly publications, and we question if not English ones also. The articles contained in every number are by the most eminent authors of the day—Agassiz, Holmes, Longfellow, Whittier, Mrs. Stowe, Bayard Taylor, etc. The February number has a spicy paper by Louis M. Goldsmith, "Doctor of a Pianist;" "Dr. John," necessarily, by H. Marvel (Donald Mitchell), and a second "Chimney Corner," by Mr. Stowe.

A Tribute to Thomas Starr King. Tichnor & Fields. A tasteful and discriminating eulogy of this already celebrated clergyman, who, dying at forty, had already achieved a fame which any octogenarian might desire. His quiet and unobtrusive life from its commencement in this city through its beneficent career in its early grave in San Francisco. King's was one of those sinless lives seemingly made for the purpose of its close and perfume the age in which they live; and his character has been delineated by Mrs. Fostringham, the widow of the author in question. The typography and binding of the volume are what are to be expected from Messrs. Tichnor & Fields.

The American News Company, 121 Nassau street, have brought out a very neat and cheap reprint of the great work on the resources of the great West. It is a compilation of the most remarkable trial, and cannot fail to be in the hands of all who take an interest in politics, saying nothing of the millions who like to know all the exact ideal of our prominent citizens. Without giving any opinion concerning the merits of Senator Douglas, we can say that every page contains most startling developments. It also lets the spectators behind the scenes, and they get a pretty good idea of how the city is governed, and where the money goes to.

The Musical Heat. J.W. Fortune, 122 Centre street, New York. This is the largest single volume of music we have seen, and is at once the best and the cheapest publication of the kind we have numbers. As the articles are no doubt aware, the Musical Heat is a monthly publication. The present volume contains over fifty pieces of music, original and selected, choice and popular, sentiment and taste, forming a complete though limited musical library. The pieces are comprehensive and select. It also contains many original articles, by the publisher for the first time. One great merit in this collection is, that it is within the capacities. We recently purchased for a Gottschalk or the purest type in the divine art, for a piece of no earthly use to us, and we may add that to purchase separately the pieces in this book in the $3 50 volume would cost no less than forty dollars. The work is beautifully printed on excellently fine paper, far superior to that of ordinary sheet music, and the manner in which it is bound makes it most desirable for convenient. In a word, in the words of Mr. Perkins's high reputation as a publisher, and cannot fail to command a large sale. We must not forget that it is embellished with a splendid portrait of Carl Formes, the celebrated German basso.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

KING JAMES, once listening to a Presbyterian preacher who was thundering fearfully against him and his policy, cried out:

"I say I have some down, man, or else speak more."

"I tell thee, C ling!" was the reply, "I will not some down, neither will I speak sense."

REGENTRY while the Americans at Honolulu, Sandwich Islands, were anxiously looking out for news from the United States, a large slipper arrived from Sandwich Islands, and a Yankee landed. He was then the only reply of the captain was:

"That there's nobody at war in the United States, but he didn't learn the particulars."

The Salem Gazette tells the following goose story:

"A young spring goose was exhibited in Salem market by a boy yesterday, which weighed, Mr. Tuesday, weighing 14 pounds! This was one of four, hatched by an old goose 79 years old! The average weight of the four was 18 pounds."

A LADY, once favored with fortune than education, a scribe which she lately gave, desired her daughter to play "the fashionable new melody she got from Covent Garden." The girl sat down to it and it was very catching.

At another scene occurred lately at an Australian theatre, in a representation of Hamlet. By a preconcerted arrangement the actors changed their clothed places with the ghost—the ghost receiving Hamlet's dresses the spirit of his murdered father. When the ghost appeared on the stage and the latter told his tale of woe, the tragedy upon which Hamlet was standing up and down, and at the ghost threw the dresses the footlights with the word "Adieu!" on his lips, while the ghost replied "Adieu, adieu!" to the calling, "I am from the gone of the excited and amused audience. The joke was complete because the manager forgot to inform the was not made aware of the change in the position of the actors.

RIGHTS OF AMERICANS.—A wag has made the following summary of what he calls the inalienable rights of Americans, and which are enumerated in the Declaration of Independence:

To marry without regard to fortune, state of health, condition, or opinion of parents.

To enter into any business without apprenticeship or experience.

To travel without regard to fortune, state of health, condition, or opinion of parents.

To be elected to any office dependent on contingencies of business, and in case of sudden death to leave no widow to mourn his loss.

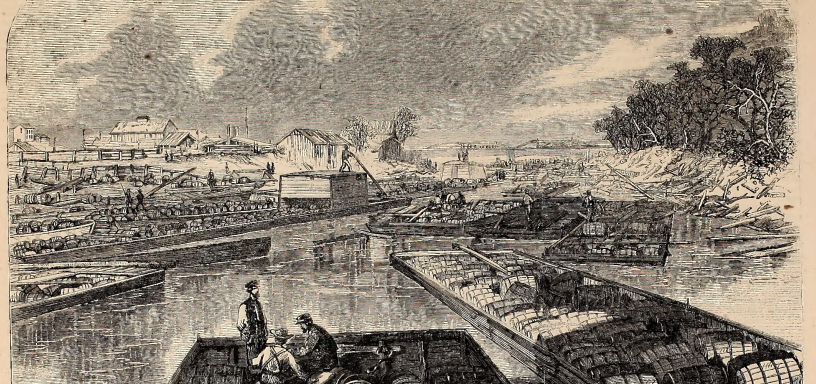
To teach our children a good trade, hoping they will not have whereon to sup, sit enough to make the industry of other people.

To receive pity and sympathy when made bankrupt by reckless speculation.

To claim the Government if possible.

To hold offices without being competent to discharge the duties.

To build houses with nine and six inch walls, go to the funeral of a male, firemen and others killed by the fall, weeping over the "mysterious dispensation of Providence."



To build car cattles and towns without any parks, public squares or places of recreation and salubrity, and all pestilence a visitation of God.

An Irish hackman, who carried Gen. Grant to his hotel in New York, agreed himself as follows:

"Sure, myself, Dennis Connolly, the biggest man in America by the size of his body, is driving Gineral Ulysses Grant, and it's more than Bobby Lee ever did."

CLARK'S PHOTOGRAPHIC GALLERY.—Some of the finest specimens of the photographic art in New York are to be found at Clark's Gallery, 644 Broadway, corner of Bleecker street. His portraits of those in the dramatic profession are especially excellent, more particularly those of De Waldon, Mrs. John Wood and Miss Bateman. Mr. Clark is very happy in the case of his sitters, showing great skill in selecting the most favorable point of view, for all know that very few looks best in some peculiar aspect. We advise all who desire to obtain good likenesses of themselves and friends to pay a visit to Mr. Clark.

SCENES IN THE OIL REGIONS OF PENNSYLVANIA.—From Sketches by our Special Artist, F. H. Schell.

VIEW OF THE MOUTH OF OIL CREEK.—ACCUMULATION OF OIL BARGES BOUND FOR PITTSBURG

SCENES IN THE OIL REGIONS OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Accumulation of Boats at Mouth of Oil Creek.

THE scene depicted usually occurs after a "pond freshet," in artificial size of the waters of Oil Creek, produced by an outflow of the "dams" erected for the purpose, some distance above the principal oil-producing territory. These artificial freshets are a necessity, as during dry seasons the depth of water is insufficient to float the loaded barges over the flats and shoals. The scene during the passage of the boats is described as novel and exhilarating in the extreme. Hundreds of boats are driving over the rushing current, requiring the nicest management by the two "bold navigators" at the oars to prevent collisions. Serious disasters have sometimes occurred, one of which, caused by a jam of the boats at the mouth of the creek, resulted in a loss of thousands of barrels of oil, besides the destruction of the barges.

Teaming on Oil Creek.

Much has been said about the depth, richness and tenacity of the mud of Petrolia, but language cannot do the subject justice. By referring to our picture it will be seen that the tenacious of the oil region have a due appreciation of its qualities. They take to the bed of the creek at every available opportunity, which being tolerably level, hard rock and covered with a uniform depth of water, affords a good though rather damp road for heavy hauling.

Getting Barges Up Stream.

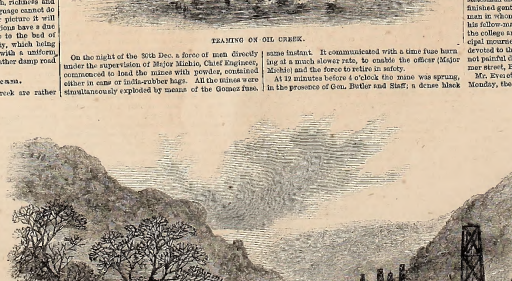
The facilities for travel down the creek are rather limited. The swarms of fortune-hunters flocking to its banks are sadly puzzled to find transportation for body or baggage. Accordingly every means of conveyance finds profitable patronage. Among others the passenger barges are somewhat popular, as the five mile current of the creek soon "puts them out of their pains," at bound down to Oil City. But the current not being sufficiently obliging to reverse its course for returning, recourse is had to horse power, two two-horse teams being hitched to the front of an empty boat, they are driven, racking and tolling on the return voyage, furnishing a decidedly novel and picturesque scene to the observer.

PROGRESS

Of the Dutch Gap Canal.

WE present this week two illustrations of the excavations at Dutch Gap, the larger of our engravings showing the explosion which was expected to dispose of the remaining barrier of earth, and open a path for the massive current of the James. This scheme, although not crowned with the precise effect intended, yet performed a useful function in disintegrating and loosening the opposing bulkhead of "sacred soil," effectually preparing a way for the river-freshet which 11 days afterwards carried off no large a part of the disturbed and (if we may so speak) demoralized barrier.

The work, in its progress since midsummer, has been fully illustrated in these pages. With unflagging courage the sappers quickly pursued their task under an irritating rebel fire, and about the close of the year prepared to pass over the balance of the work to the swift handicraft of gunpowder.



This fuse is made of a composition which burns with the unerring velocity of a mile in four seconds. The different mines being at different distances from the point of ignition, this instantaneous Gomez fuse was necessary in order to ignite the different mines at the same instant. It communicated with a time fuse burning at a much slower rate, to enable the officer (Major Michie) and the force to retire in safety.

At 12 minutes before 4 o'clock the mine was sprung, in the presence of Gen. Butler and Staff; a dense black smoke at first immediately following the upheaval o the earth, was succeeded by a ponderous cloud of white smoke, which entirely filled the Gap and concealed the result of the scheme. On rolling away it revealed the bank settled again into nearly its former position, but indented with a species of canal, into which the water ran slowly from the canal below. No connection between the canal and the river was immediately established, although, as we intimated above, the disturbance of the embankment disposed it suitably for the gradual action of the current, and lightened the subsequent labors of the gang.

We have been thus particular in detailing a novel experiment in American engineering, since the present interesting position of Gen. Butler before the public renders his attempt in an unsectionized science a matter of importance to every one.

THE DEATH OF HON. EDWARD EVERETT.

AT 4 o'clock on Sunday morning, Jan. 15, 1865, America lost her principal orator, her great scholar, statesman and patriot, and one of her most beloved and finished gentlemen, in the person of Edward Everett, a man in whom love of country, love of letters and love of his fellow-man were so finely blended, that the State, the college and the public each claim the place of principal mourner at his grave. After a life most usefully devoted to these several interests, he met a sudden but not painful death by a paralytic, at his residence on Somerset street, Boston, in the 71st year of his age.

Mr. Everett addressed his friends at Faneuil Hall on Monday, the 16th, in aid of sending provisions to Savannah, and, during the afternoon of that day, was present in court in reference to a claim for damages against the city of Charlestown, for the widening a portion of his estate in Medford by constructing a dam on Mystic river. On Tuesday he commenced a severe cold, but neither his friends nor himself deemed it serious. During Saturday evening he appeared much as usual, and retired to bed without abundance. About 3 o'clock next morning his housekeeper entered the chamber, and found him sleeping naturally. An hour later she was alarmed by hearing a heavy fall in his room, and found him lying on the floor, breathing heavily. A physician was promptly summoned, but before his arrival Mr. Everett died.

We are unable to give more than a rapid outline of his career. Edward Everett was born in Dorchester, Mass., of a distinguished family, April 11, 1794. The first letter of the promising intellect was Daniel Webster, under whose auspicious guidance he was prepared for his admission to Harvard at the early age of 13. He graduated brilliantly in 1811. Selecting divinity as a profession, he studied theology for two years later, when he entered upon his duties as pastor in the Brattle street church, Boston. In 1814 he published a defence of Christianity in challenge of a famous infidel tract of the day. The chair of Greek literature at Harvard College, becoming vacant about this time, Mr. Everett received and accepted the position, but before resuming its responsibilities fortified his body and brain by a four years course of travel and study abroad. In Europe he gathered the friendship of the prominent literary people in the countries he visited, and returning home began his career of professor with magnificent enthusiasm and energy, lending a noble impulse to classical study by the fire and scholarship of his lectures.

About this time began his oratorical fame. His connection with the public press had commenced years before, with his able management of the North American Review. He entered Congress in 1824: was elected in 1834 Governor of Massachusetts by a large majority. In 1840, by the influence of Mr. Webster, he was appointed Minister to England, and on his return to America in 1845 he accepted the office of President at Harvard. In 1852 he entered the cabinet of Mr. Fillmore as Secretary of State, on the death of Webster, and while yet in office, he received from his native State the compliment of an election as Senator. His late career of usefulness and charity still lives in the minds of all; by his labors he realised about $90,000 for the fund towards purchasing Mount Vernon, only last year he exerted himself for the East Tennessee Relief Fund, the success of which was principally due to his spirited and intelligent aid. His last public words were uttered on last Monday week in aid of the hapless poor of Savannah, and on the succeeding Sabbath he died.

THE LATE HON. EDWARD EVERETT.

ESCAPE OF TWO UNION OFFICERS FROM A STOCKADE IN TEXAS.

Terrible Hardship.

On the 13th of November, 1864, two of our officers belonging to the land and naval services respectively escaped from Camp Groce in Texas, and arrived in New Orleans on the 8th of December, after the most incredible sufferings endured throughout a journey of 450 miles.

Lieut.-Col. Florey, of the 46th Indiana Vols., and Capt. Benjamin Loring, commanding U. S. gunboat Wave, were captured by the rebels at Calcasieu Pass, La.

Escaping together from the prison at Camp Groce, they commenced their fearful march through a hostile country, the path being through canebrakes, over marshes and across rivers and bayous. Their means of transport on the water would be sometimes a stolen boat, sometimes an extemporaneous raft supporting their clothes, while the fugitives swam and pushed behind. The almost impassible thickets of briers were either bridged or picked at and crawled through. During 20 days they waded across an overflowed country, from ankle to outstanding depth; crossing across bayous, and cautiously making their way upon the charred remains of railroad bridges near Brashear City, living on parched corn and acorns 10 days; travelling five successive nights from sunset till daybreak (sleeping but three hours within that time), in beds where beds were under the hollow of the foot, and, for the last three nights, in utmost nakedness. They were completely exhausted on arriving at New Orleans.

We are indebted for these particulars to an interesting letter from Mr. Lilienthal, the eminent New Orleans photographer. We should be glad to publish it in full, but want of space compels us to substitute this brief abstract.

THE PRISON PEN AT MILLEN, GA.

IN a former number of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER we gave a sketch representing the wall side of the Prison Pen at Millen, which is a little town about midway between Savannah and Milledgeville, and on the banks of the Ogeechee river. When Gen. Sherman commenced his mysterious march from Atlanta, the rebel authorities, bubbling upon the expression in one of his letters, that "he should most probably take relief to the Union prisoners at Andersonville himself," came to the same conclusion that many of the Northern papers did, that he had gone to release them from the barbarous grip of the Southern jailers. Acting upon this idea, the rebels scattered the great prison camp at Andersonville, and dispatched their unhappy victims to various other places less liable to interfere. One of these selected spots was Millen, which was entered by our army on the 8th Dec., but, alas! the enemy had removed our brave men from the Pen, and nothing remained but a sight of woe, such as the eye seldom covers.

Our Special Artist has sketched this Golgotha, and we doubt not it will create in the bosoms of our readers the same sentiments of horror which it did in those of the gallant soldiers who viewed with silent rage the scene of their brother soldiers' persecution and sufferings.

Our illustration will prove more eloquent than any description—here were our brave and starved men compelled to burrow like wild beasts, contrary to all the pangs of hunger and the insults of their brutal jailors. We have no wish to render the feeling which the Northern breast cannot fail to entertain towards our common foe more bitter than it is, and we shall therefore say no little as possible about the atrocities perpetrated upon our brave and utterly defenceless men, but historical truth compels us to give an extract from a letter of one of the officers who escaped from the fangs of these merciless wretches. He says:—

"Having escaped from these horrors I do not like to revert to them—there are certain sorrows the recollection of which is not altogether painful, but when I think of what I endured, and what I saw thousands of my brave compatriots suffer, the horrors crowd so fast upon me that all sense of my own fortunate escape is lost in a profound hole and a desire for vengeance, which I did think at one time I never could feel. One brutal fellow, Capt. Wirtz, post-captain in the rebel service, but at near being a counter as it is possible for the most devilish ingenuity to achieve. When the poor half-famished fellows came to the camp they were kept standing in the hot sun, and if they attempted to sit down, or recline, he ordered them to be shot, a command which was frequently obeyed with alacrity by the scarce less brutal sentries. His language to us is too horrible and obscene for publication. Death refused many of our gallant fellows from the oppression of this miscreant. Oh! that he may one day come in my path —one of us never shall live beyond that meeting. We had really no clothing—except rags—our money, clothes, and even our shirts were taken off our backs. When I crawled out of my hole of a morning and looked about it was the common sight to see many lying dead whom the night before I had taken a sad farewell of—the great wonder is that life can be so tenacious under such terrible privations!"

DESCRIPTION OF THE RIO BRAVO.—"Imagine four of the crookedest things in the world, then imagine four more twice as crooked, and then fancy to yourself a large river three times as crooked as all these put together, and you have a faint idea of the crooked disposition of this almighty crooked river. There is no drift in it, from the fact that it is so crooked that timber can't find its way far enough down to lodge two sticks together—but few snakes, because it is not straight enough to swim in, and the fish are all in the whirlpool from the bends, because they can't find their way out. Birds frequently attempt to fly across the river, and light on the same side they shrieked from, being deceived by the different smoke. Indeed, you may be deceived when you think you see across it, and some of the Khoys say it is so dark—I twisting there isn't but one side to it."

BY BOOTHROYD FARCLOUGH.

WHERE Moscow's gilded minarets glare amid her sunny domes,
Where London spreads her vastness forth and sheds a yellow glow,
Where gaudy Paris courts the day, and silent Venice smiles,
And suns in splendor rise and set amid the Ægean isles;

Where Egypt's ancient glories rise and rolls her mighty stream,
Where Freedom in her grandeur still and awful as a dream;
Where wondrous Luxor rose and fell at dread Jehovah's word,
And nations covered in the dust and trembled as they heard;

Where fair Damascus shines afar, beneath the Asian sky,
The glory of the Orient, imperial as old Rome;
Where Rome herself, the queen of earth, looks down upon her shrunken still,
In ancient and undying pride from seven hills to Sorrento's hill;

From sweet Killarney's placid lakes to Seville's Moorish towers,
From Jungfrau's everlasting snows to Mariposa's bowers,
Through every scene that earth can show to fascinate the heart,
I passed as one enchanted by the magic touch of art.

In all their lifelike splendor, too, my startled vision caught
The sculptured wonders of the world by Phidean chisels wrought;
And gazing on those forms divine, forgot the artist's skill,
And could not learn the hand that shaped was but a mortal's still.

PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION.

CHLOASMA, or MOTH PATCHES, LENTIGO, or FRECKLES. Blemishes on the face, called Moth, are very annoying, particularly to ladies of high complexion, as the discolored spots on the skin show more clearly in contrast. Freckles on brunettes, but they contribute greatly in marring the beauty of either; and anything that will remove them without injuring the skin in texture or color, would be considered a great achievement in medical science. DR. B. C. PERRY, of Boston, has for some time to diseases of the skin, has discovered an infallible remedy for the removal of Moth, Freckles and other discolorations, without injury to the skin in any manner. Prepared only by DR. B. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, 49 Bond Street, New York. WEEKS & POTTER, 170 Washington Street, Boston, Wholesale Agents for New England. Sold by all Druggists. Call for Perry's Moth and Freckle Lotion. Price $2 per bottle.

GOLD PENS
FOR THE MILLION!
AND PENS TO SUIT THE HAND
AND
PRICES TO SUIT THE POCKET.
The Best Gold Pens in the World!

On receipt of the following name, we will send, by mail, or as otherwise directed, a Gold Pen or Pens, selected to the same according to the description, namely:

GOLD PENS, IN SILVER PLATED EXTENSION CASES, WITH PENCILS.

For $1 No. 2 pen; for $1 25 No. 3 pen; for $1 50 No. 4 pen; for $2 50 No. 5 pen; for $3 50 No. 6 pen.

These pens are stamped THE IMPERIAL PEN, and are well finished and fine writing Gold pens, with good iridium points, although they are unwarranted, and cannot be exchanged.

Our name, Gold Pen Co., N. Y., is stamped on all our fine quality Pens, and the points are warranted for six months, except against accident. Our second QUALITY Pens are all stamped THE NATIONAL PEN, and the name of Gold Pen Co., N. Y., is not generally made, having the same points as our first quality Pens, but only gives a discount being the quality of the gold.

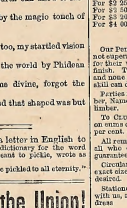
GOLD PENS, 1st AND 2D QUALITY, IN SOLID SILVER EXTENSION CASES, WITH PENCILS.

For $2 20 a No. 1 pen 1st qual., or a No. 3 pen 2d qual.
For $2 75 a No. 2 pen 1st qual., or a No. 4 pen 2d qual.
For $3 75 a No. 3 pen 1st qual., or a No. 5 pen 2d qual.
For $4 50 a No. 4 pen 1st qual., or a No. 6 pen 2d qual.
For $6 50 a No. 5 pen 1st qual., or a No. 6 pen 2d qual.

THE SAME GOLD PENS, IN SOLID SILVER OR GOLD PLATED EBONY DESK HOLDERS AND NOZZLE CASES.

For $2 25 a No. 3 pen 1st qual., or a No. 4 pen 2d qual.
For $3 50 a No. 4 pen 1st qual., or a No. 5 pen 2d qual.
For $4 50 a No. 5 pen 1st qual., or a No. 6 pen 2d qual.
For $4 00 a No. 6 pen 1st qual., or a No. 7 pen 2d qual.
For $5 50 a No. 7 pen 1st qual., or a No. 8 pen.
For $12 00 a No. 13 pen; all first quality.

Our Pens each throughout are guaranteed as equal—if not superior—to any Gold Pens manufactured, not only by their writing qualities, but by their general elegant finish. The greatest care is taken in their manufacture, and none are sold with the slightest imperfection which shall can detect.



Parties in ordering must invariably specify the Number, Name and Quality, whether coarse or fine, stiff or limber.

TO CLUBS.—A discount of 12 per cent. will be allowed on sums of $15, if sent to one address, at one time; 15 per cent. on $25; 20 per cent. on $50.

All remittances by mail, Registered, are at our risk, to $1 00; when sums of 50 cents, have the registered stamp affixed.

Satisfaction or refunding of money, to correspond with us, as we can offer them great inducements. ✦Address

HOSTETTER'S
CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this season of the year, when the system is debilitated with the direst poisons, under the name of imported liquors, which degenerate constitutions, paralyze the intellect, but not a whit less pernicious, are hawked by the world as sovereign remedies, that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known then, that within the circle of a hundred miles of Pittsburgh there are imported, and constantly stored away, annually with every article containing alcohol or spirit, a mortal poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain no poisonous ingredients, but are a combination of pure Essence of Spring with the purest juices of forest valuable vegetable antidotes and specimen herbs and plants, and are offered to the public as a sure, safe and speedy remedy for diseased complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales are the very equal to the combined sales of all the other bitters advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its greatness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every profession, calling and walk of life. Beware of imitations and impositions.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

In consequence of the depression of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war now raging in this country, I have purchased a large and Valuable Jewellery, originally intended for the English market, which I am now offering in this country.
MUST BE SOLD AT ANY SA RIFICE!
Under these circumstances I, HOWARD & CO., setting as Agents for the principal European Manufacturers, have resolved to dispose of the entire Stock, agreeably to the following regulations:
Certificates, stating each article and its value, are placed in Sealed Envelopes and well mixed. One of these Certificates will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of 25 cents.
ALL ARTICLES SOLD AT ONE DOLLAR EACH, WITHOUT REGARD TO VALUE!!
On receiving the Certificate you will see what you are going to have, and then it is at Your option to send the dollar and get it or not, as you like. Purchasers may also obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any Set of Jewellery on the above terms. Certificates will in no case be sent for less than 25 cents. The price of Certificates is as follows:

Single	25 cents.
Five for	$1
Eleven for	2
Thirty for	5
Sixty for	10
One hundred for	15

Agents will be allowed a commission of every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to Five Dollars. Send for a circular containing full particulars, and remit 25 cents to us, either in cash or postage Stamps.

It loads by simply removing the cylinder, with CENTRAL FIRE and WATERPROOF COPPER SHELL CARTRIDGE. The cylinder never rotates. Fire, Six shots easily executed after firing. The cylinder never rotates. It has 7 inches extreme length, 32-inch ball, six shot rail weighs but 14 ounces. For sale by the trade.

GEO. A. RICKOCK, 14 Cliff Street, New York.

CERTIFICATE.

I have thoroughly tested the new "National Revolver," and find it an effective weapon, of sure fire and convenient size. At fifty yards I think I could with this pistol hit at every shot. I take pleasure in recommending it as a weapon in every way adapted for service. In company with Captain Scott, Provost-Marshal, of Colfax, I fired a target with this pistol a hasty manner of times, and not one cartridge failed to explode.

Testimonial from the most distinguished Artists to

STEINWAY & SONS

NEW YORK, December, 1864.

The Pianofortes, grand, square and upright, manufactured by Messrs. Steinway & Sons have established for themselves a world-wide a reputation, that it is hereby possible for us to add anything to these just praises.

Having thoroughly tested and tried these instruments personally for years, both in public and private, it becomes a pleasant duty to express our candid opinion regarding their unquestioned superiority over any other Piano known to us.

Among the chief points of their uniform excellence are:

Greatest possible depth, richness and volume of tone, combined with a rare brilliancy, elasticity and perfect evenness throughout the entire scale, and above all, a surprising duration of sound, the pure and symphonic quality of which never changes under the most delicate or powerful touch.

This peculiarity is found exclusively in the "Steinway Piano," and together with the noiseless precision, elasticity and promptness of action always characterizing these instruments, as well as their unequalled durability under the severest trials, is truly surprising, and claims at once the admiration of every artist; we therefore consider

The "Steinway Pianos," in all respects, the best instruments made in this country or Europe, use them solely, and exclusively ourselves in public and private, and recommend them invariably to our friends and the public.

We have at different times expressed our opinion respecting the Pianos of various makers. I freely and unhesitatingly pronounce Messrs. Steinway & Sons' Pianos far superior to them all.

Fall of Fort Fisher and its Results.

THE details of the second and successful attempt on Fort Fisher have been for some time before the public, and are familiar to our readers. They justify the concurrent opinion of the Government and people, that the first attempt should not have failed. The garrison of the work in December was relatively weak, and the defences in January, after the experience gained by the rebels during the first bombardment, were considerably stronger than before. As a consequence, the cost of the capture in blood was greatly enhanced. Gen. Butler may boast that he did not expose the lives of his soldiers; but his unpardonable failure to attack imposed on others the necessity of making fearful sacrifices of life. The course of the war had made it necessary to shut up the great blockade-running port of Wilmington, through which the rebels drew the larger part of their munitions of war, and without which they could not hope to prosecute the struggle efficiently. The reduction of Fort Fisher was, furthermore, an essential part of that grand plan of operations formed by Gen. Grant, for the destruction of the only remaining effective rebel army, and the capture of Richmond. It was something, therefore, worth taking risks for; it was a result necessary to be accomplished. Gen. Butler, it is feared, through waywardness and in a spirit of hostility to the commander of the co-operating naval forces, refused to take the risks, and did not accomplish the result. It was fit and proper, consequently, that he should be set aside, especially as it now appears that the command was not assigned to to him, but assumed by him in virtue of his ranking the officer designated by the Lieut.-General. We have always maintained that the nation must not fail, and that the men who fail must give place to the men who can succeed. Success is the only standard of judgment as regards military men. If they fail through no fault of their own, history will probably set them right; we cannot now stop to weigh evidence; the nation's life is of vastly more consequence than a general's reputation. This country has but one behest—Do thou succeed! Gen Butler did not succeed, and was replaced by Gen. Terry, who did. "All's well that ends well," however. We have got Fort Fisher, albeit at heavy cost. It was gallantly taken, and is the trophy equally of the army and navy. The co-operation of the two arms was essential to success. Impregnable to an attack from the sea, it was also unassailable from the land, unless subjected to such a naval bombardment as should silence its guns, until a land force could establish itself sufficiently near to make an assault practicable. This is precisely what was done, and the fort fell, after an obstinate hand to hand struggle in its trenches and among its traverses, unparalleled for severity by any similar action of this century. The storming of the Malakoff by the French, during the war in the Crimea, is the only action of modern times that can compare with the storming of Fort Fisher. It was defended by 76 heavy guns and a garrison of 2,600 men, under the command of able and experienced officers.

FINAL AND TRIUMPHANT ASSAULT ON FORT FISHER, NEAR WILMINGTON, N. C., 9 P.M., JAN. 15.—FROM A SKETCH BY AN OFFICER.

With its capture, Fort Caswell, of 83 guns, is cut off from Wilmington, and rendered useless, as well as the numerous other forts and batteries on the Cape Fear river. These have either been abandoned or destroyed, and it is reported that Fort Caswell has been blown up. The capture of Wilmington is, therefore, easy, and only a question of time and convenience.

From Wilmington as a base, the whole line of communication between Richmond and the further South may be commanded. Charleston will be cut off, and its defenders so isolated as to fall an easy prey to Sherman, unless they evacuate the place and retreat on Lee, as they most likely will do. The course of the war seems to tend towards cooping up the whole rebel force in and around Richmond, with the implacable Grant on one side and the impetuous Sherman on the other. Unless Mr. Davis leaves his capital soon, he and his cabinet, his generals and his army will have to surrender themselves there. The avenues of escape are closing fast.

The stopping up of Wilmington will carry dismay into Nassau, and the other outlying ports of England. The blockade-running business is at an end. Woe to the Lairds and the Lindsays! Let Trenholm and Spence heap their heads with ashes. The glory of Nassau has departed, and the sand crabs will again invade its lately busy streets. Let the Governor of the Bahamas proclaim a day of humiliation and prayer.

With the fall of Fisher, gold has toppled from its proud eminence. Two weeks ago it stood at 235—to-day it is below 200, with nobody to do it reverence. The men who have been speculating on the prospect of national ruin, and deluded themselves with the notion that the nation was moribund, now slouch their hats over their eyes, thrust deep their hands in their empty pockets, and thread our streets gloomily, wiser if not better men.

In a word, Secession and its sympathisers are sullen and sad, with the exception of the sublime optimists of the Richmond press, who discern "good in everything." They were greatly relieved when Atlanta fell; the capture of Savannah was a positive good, and left the "Confederacy all the stronger." And now that Forts Fisher and Caswell are gone, their only avenue to Europe closed, and Wilmington as good as taken, they pronounce the whole thing "a blessing in disguise!" We must say the disguise is perfect; and we can now conceive of nothing less than the capture of Charleston and Richmond to make their happiness complete. They will not have to wait long for the ecstasy which those two events will be sure to occasion. In the meantime, let them rejoice in the certainty that both are close at hand.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Illustrated Almanac for 1865.

This annual contains a greater amount of useful and entertaining information than any publication of the kind ever issued. It is indeed the only Lady's Illustrated Almanac published. It is embellished with over 70 beautiful engravings, by the finest Artists of the day, executed in the highest style of art. It contains directions for the parlor, ball-room, boudoir, store-room, kitchen, garden, nursery and sick-room. In a word, it is the matron's vade mecum, as well as the young lady's companion, and it should be found in every household. In addition to general illustrations, it contains splendid portraits of Mrs. Lincoln and Mrs. McClellan, exquisitely engraved on steel, and a graphic Bathing-Scene at Long Branch, printed on fine paper. This complete Lady's Manual—which contains more reading matter than an octavo volume—costs only 50 cents. It will be sent, postage free, on receipt of the price, either in currency or postage stamps. FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,

537 Pearl Street, New York.

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 4, 1865.

All Communications, Books for Review, etc., must be addressed to Frank Leslie, 537 Pearl street, New York.

To Correspondents.

The columns of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper are always open for contributions from good writers.

All communications will be promptly considered; and liberal prices will be paid for all manuscripts that are deemed worthy of acceptance.

Interesting stories, lively sketches, and poems of a high order of merit, if not too long, will be received with favor.

Short stories, fraught with incident, character and dramatic effect, are always preferable to long ones.

All manuscripts should be legibly written, on good paper, and on only one side of the sheets. Manuscripts written on both sides will be declined without examination.

Correspondents are requested to write their names and addresses, legibly and in full, on each manuscript that they send to this office.

Special Notice.

The commencement of the 16th volume of Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine affords the public an opportunity for subscribing to this unequalled periodical, and enables the publisher to call attention to the great improvements made from time to time in this complete manual for the fair sex. These have been so well appreciated by the public that it has more than doubled its circulation.

Independent of its being the first authority in the world of fashion, its literature is of the most varied and entertaining character; consisting of a continued romance, with tales, novellettes, adventures, poetry and other articles of general interest. These are embellished with original illustrations, by the first artists.

Every number contains a double page colored steel fashion plate, besides splendid patterns of every article of ladies' dress. These alone would cost at least $100 were they obtained from European capitals.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine has also a recommendation which no other publication of the kind can boast; for, by a special arrangement with its Agents in Paris, London, Berlin and Vienna, the advance sheets of their fashion publications are transmitted to it, while its facilities for copying them are so complete that they can be republished here in a few hours after they are received.

The following are the terms for 1865: One copy, $3 50; four copies to one Post-office, $14, with the additional advantage of one copy gratis to the person sending that amount. Subscriptions should be addressed to Frank Leslie, 537 Pearl street, near Broadway, New York.

From an immense number of notices, which, if we were to them publish entire, would fill our paper, we select the salient points of a few of them. They will indicate better than anything we can say, the opinion of the public in regard to Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine:

The Bridgetown Chronicle says: "Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine is the most valuable and interesting work of the kind ever published. Every number contains on an average over a hundred patterns of every description of ladies' attire. The patterns are of the full size, thus making every lady her own dressmaker. The colored steel fashion-plate alone is worth the price of the magazine. We notice, also, that these fashions are in advance of similar publications."

The Napa Reporter says: "If the ladies want a good magazine, one got up especially for them, they should subscribe for Leslie's. Besides the fashion-plates, patterns, etc., it contains a large amount of excellent reading matter."

The Weekly Delaware Journal and Statesman says: "This magazine may be looked upon as being the first authority in all matters relating to dress. The literature consists of a continued romance by one of the most eminent authors of the age, as well as interesting tales, novelettes and adventures, all of which are embellished by original illustrations by the first artists."

The Dubuque Chronicle says: "The fact that it has now reached its sixteenth volume speaks for the character of the work. It will be favored during the coming year with constant contributions from its regular staff of writers, whose names are familiar to the reading public as those of the first and best American authors. Its fashions alone are worth to the ladies twice its cost, and its illustrations are unexcelled."

The New Hampshire Chronicle says: "Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine is the most brilliant fashion magazine published. In addition to numerous engravings illustrating the romances and literature, it contains more fashion-plates than any other two magazines. It is indeed an elegant work."

The Muskegon, Michigan, says: "As a specimen of American printing, for beautiful colored fashion-plates and engravings, we know of no magazine approaching an equality with this one. It devotes on an average twenty pages to fashion-plates and their explanations; so fully, indeed, that any lady can use these plates in making her own dresses. In addition, there are fifty large pages devoted to general reading and illustrations."

The Chicago Tribune says: "The fashions in Leslie's are the earliest published in the country, and more reliable, as the publisher employs agents in Paris, Berlin and London to transmit the styles at the earliest moment. Mr. Leslie is deserving of the thanks of every lady in the country for the labor he bestows upon this magazine."

M. Alexandre Dumas, père we presume, is coming to America—having, probably found out that the savages of the United States, instead of scalping foreigners, have taken to killing each other. We know of no reason why M. Alexandre Dumas père, or M. Alexandre Dumas fils, or why the whole family of the Dumases with their friends should not come to the United States, so they behave themselves and pay their way. We have had some hundreds of thousands of people come over to us from Europe during the year past, and we presume not over a tenth of them are in our almshouses and penitentiaries. Very few of them, however, have been heralded, except one Muller, since hung; and still fewer have avowed that their object in coming was to straighten our public affairs, or to set us right before Christendom.

M. Alexandre Dumas has written a letter to an eminent resident (we came near writing citizen, but the name rather staggered us), who subscribes himself "Eug. Von Nordhausen, A. M., LL. B., Attorney and Counsellor, No., etc., etc., apparently in response to a suggestion or invitation from the latter, in which he says he is coming over to the United States, with a secretary, as soon as he gets certain plays off his hands, sometime about the close of January. He proposes to do several things; first, to bring out a novel which the English publishers declined because it told the truth about the British sea-god Nelson; second, to lecture on his bloody campaign in Italy with Garibaldi; and finally, to write a history of the first four years of Mr. Lincoln's Presidency, as "picturesque as possible." He did once think, it seems, of writing his travels in "four volumes of eight hundred thousand letters, for instance," but he finally "insists" on a history—which, with genuine Gallic modesty, he asserts, if published "in English, French, etc., would throw a great light upon those whose egotistical interests are pushing them in the shade"—if anybody knows what that means. He suggests a subscription as the best way of making the book go, and after telling the conspicuous person aforesaid (we again came near writing citizen), to "present the President with my [his] respects and admiration;" he winds up with another characteristic observation, that "this history by me would be read throughout the whole of Europe." Mr. Von Nordhausen himself volunteers to tell us that the prospective grand historian is to bring with him a wonderful cantatrice, who is to witch us with her voice, while Dumas père glorifies us with his quill and—bleeds us for his book.

As we said at the outset, there can be no possible objection to M. Dumas or anybody else coming over here, so he behaves himself, and pays his bills. But M. Dumas must know the people of the United States are no longer to be exploited by litterateurs big or little. Mr. Lincoln may possibly have heard of M. Dumas as a writer of French novels of lurid exterior and doubtful morals, and probably has about the same notion that heads of families in the United States generally entertain, that French novels are not good to have in the house. The impertinence of asking an obscure person, albeit an "LL. B.," to give the President his "respects and admiration," is delightfully French and Dumas-y. The object of setting us right before Europe, if we cared any longer a fig for what Europe thinks of us, might be taken as some sort of a claim on our attentions and pockets; but, on the whole, we prefer to leave the business to Grant, Sherman, Thomas, Farragut and Porter. Or, if we could not record our history after making it, and were compelled to look abroad for a chronicler, we might, perhaps, prefer a Smith, or a Cochin, to a Dumas.

We hope M. Dumas will not accuse us of levity, but we would really suggest that he no longer "insist" on a history, but put the first four years of Mr. Lincoln's administration in a melo-drama of four acts, to be tailed off with a grand tableau, representing Von Nordhausen presenting the "respects and admiration" of M. Alexandre Dumas to the American President!

The collections on account of the internal revenue tax, in the city of New York, for the year 1864, amounted to $18,243,000. It is estimated, for the year 1865, at $30,000,000. The largest taxpayer in New York is the great drygoods man, Mr. A. T. Stewart, whose income for 1863 is registered at $1,843,000, on which he paid an extra income-tax of $92,181. The Tribune sympathises with any man who has to take care of so much property for nothing but his victuals and clothes!

The peninsula of Lenkoran (Asiatic Russia) contains numerous springs of naphtha, or petroleum. There are one hundred now worked, which yield annually about 4,000 tons of naphtha, similar to that of Pennsylvania. There are also many springs of the kind in the isle of Taman. Petroleum has also been discovered near Piura, in Peru, and a company is organized for working wells in California, where its existence is vouched for by the sufficient authority of Prof. Benj. Silliman. It is supposed large reservoirs exist near the poles, else how are the axles of the earth lubricated?

The Tribune publishes a statement of its business for the past year, 1864, which amounted to: Receipts, $747,501; expenditures, $735,751; leaving a profit of but $11,750. This comparatively small profit on so large a business is due to the enhanced price of paper. Had that remained at the same price as in 1863, the difference would have been $126,000.

Few persons, even those living in the great centres where newspapers are mostly manufactured, have any adequate idea of the extent of the business. Ten years ago the whole amount of business done by the wholesale news-agents did not probably exceed in amount the sum of $750,000 yearly. At present the cash receipts of the American News Company, in this city, for the sale of newspapers, magazines, books and stationery, for the eleven months ending with the 31st of December last, have reached the sum of $2,226,372 83. We learn from the office of that company that probably 40,000,000 of newspapers were handled within that time by persons in the employ of the company, of whom seventy were constantly occupied in getting them in, charging, distributing and shipping them. For wrapping paper and twine with which to pack this enormous mass, the company paid twelve thousand dollars! This is the business of one news agency alone.

IN the whirl and excitement of such a war as ours, it is not surprising that many good and great men may pass away without so much as "a funeral note" to mark their exit and burial. But their names are such as men will not willingly let die, and in the calm which must succeed this storm, these will be recalled and receive the homage which they merit, and which, for the moment, would seem to have been denied. Living genius must bide its time, and patiently wait through the years of toil which precedes recognition. It is easy for the dead to wait for the time when men shall turn to gather up the jewels which they flung aside when they stripped themselves to mortal combat, and which, in the hurly-hurly of the strife, were forgotten. On the 21st of December, in the island of Santa Cruz, whither he had gone in the vain hope of staying the ravages of consumption, died Wm. H. Fry, of this city—a man of genius and accomplishments, a spirited writer, a brilliant composer, an unselfish politician and an ardent friend. He was, we believe, the only successful musical composer that our country has produced, and his "Leonora" and "Notre Dame de Paris" live to attest his ability in this most difficult line of art. As a writer for the press he was equally caustic and discriminating, and his criticisms on music and the drama in this metropolis must stand as models in that department. Mr. Fry threw himself into the great struggle in which we are engaged with all the ardor and enthusiasm of his nature, and if circumstances prevented his personal participation in the ranks, his voice, nevertheless, was "worth a thousand men." Over-exertion in the forum is often as fatal as exposure in the field; on a constitution and organization like his it reacted with fearful force, and he died as truly a hero of the war as did the gallant Winthrop when he leaped into the throat of the rebel cannon.

Mr. Fry was a native of Philadelphia, son of a prominent journalist of that city, proprietor of the old National Gazette, and at the time of his death was about fifty years of age. To the last he was cheerful, manly, brilliant and self-sustaining. He was no whining invalid, even when racked by disease, and met his death as became a man knowing the "common lot" of humanity, carrying down his flag gallantly at the fore.

AN effort has been again made in Congress to repeal the duty on paper, a matter in which the publishers of books and newspapers are not alone interested, but which is of special importance to the public. Books and newspapers have nearly or quite doubled in price during the past two years, owing in part to the enhanced price of labor, but principally to the greatly augmented cost of paper, which is nearly or quite three times what is was three years ago. Many newspapers, in consequence of this enhanced cost, have been obliged to carry out their contracts with their subscribers at a heavy loss, absolutely receiving for their printed newspaper less than the cost of the white paper itself. Of course newspapers must bear their proper burthens, and we know of none that are unwilling to do so. But when we talk of taxing paper so heavily, and "protecting" it by a duty, we must remember that publishers are obliged to pay three per cent. on the paper used, three per cent. on their advertisements, five per cent. on their job printing. They are taxed on the light and fuel consumed, taxed on the ink, oil and glue used, taxed on their types and presses; they must pay a publisher's licence and a job printer's licence; and if they have any profit remaining, they pay an income-tax thereon. Except the latter, none of these taxes are imposed on publishers in Great Britain. There, after many years of experience in the "art and science of taxation," it has been decided that there should be no taxes on knowledge, or on its diffusion. Hence the removal of the stamp duty on newspapers, and hence also, the reduction of postage, so as to facilitate their circulation and encourage correspondence. A "tax on knowledge" is the most injurious one that can be devised. It makes dear newspapers, dear schoolbooks, dear copybooks, dear Bibles, dear prayer and hymnbooks, and tends to shut out the light of knowledge from the toiling masses of the people.

The Government has no interest in continuing the duty, as it derives no income therefrom, because no printing paper is imported. The manufacturers are enabled to fix their prices just at that figure which excludes importation, and yet gobbles the 20 per cent. gold duty. The Government is an immense consumer of paper. During the past eight months it has lost more than a million of dollars in consequence of the duty, which it has been obliged to pay. The present law actually taxes the Government 20 per cent. in gold on the paper it consumes. There is therefore no good reason why the duty on paper should be continued, while there are many why it should be abolished—a matter that concerns the public quite as much as the publishers.

Summary of the War.

NORTH CAROLINA.

The great military achievement of the week is the capture of Fort Fisher, which we have described and illustrated in another part of our paper. As far as can be ascertained the number of rebel prisoners was 2,100, and 72 guns, including one Armstrong, and as this is the exclusive property of the British Government considerable curiosity is felt to learn how it got there.

One of our correspondents, Acting-Ensign Laycock, of U. S steamer Susquehanna, to whom we are indebted for several sketches of the bombardment and assault, says, in his letter: "On the night of the 16th of Jan. the rebels blew up Fort Caswell, and burned Smithville, so that now all the forts at the mouth of Cape Fear river are in our hands."

On the night of the 18th Jan. five blockade-runners, not aware that the place was in our possession, ran into Cape Fear river, and fell into our hands, to their great astonishment and chagrin.

On the morning after the fall of Fort Fisher the magazine exploded, and it is said that nearly 200 of our gallant fellows were destroyed, thus making our casualties in killed and wounded about 1,200 men. It is rumored that Wilmington is also in our possession. The rebels have destroyed their gunboats the Tallahassee and Chicamanga.

LOUISIANA.

New Orleans papers give the particulars of Gen. Grierson's last grand raid in Mississippi. Gen. Grierson left Memphis on the 21st Dec., with about 3,000 cavalry, and arrived at Vicksburg on the 5th Jan., having in the meantime destroyed about 70 miles of the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, and 30 miles of the Mississippi Central Railroad, with all their bridges and vast amounts of rebel military stores and railroad running stock, factories, etc., defeated and scattered the rebels who opposed him at different points, cut their communications, and played general havoc with them. During the expedition, General Grierson's men marched 400 miles, and met with a loss of less than 100 in killed, wounded and missing, reaching Vicksburg with nearly 600 prisoners, about 1,000 contrabands and the same number of horses and mules.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Gen. Sherman is advancing towards Charleston. His forces had occupied Pocotaligo, a small town on the Charleston and Savannah Railroad, 55 miles from Charleston, and 45 from Savannah. The rebel Gen. Laws evacuated it on the 14th of January.

VIRGINIA.

There have been no military moves since our last. Exchanged and escaped prisoners relate the most harrowing stories of the sufferings of the Union prisoners in the Libey prison, 36 dying from starvation and exposure in one day. There are now confined therein 3,000 men and about 70 officers.

COLD COUNTRY GRAIN.

The Peruvian Quinua.

MR. E. G. SQUIER, one of our late Commissioners to Peru, delivered an address before the Farmers' Club of the American Institute, a few days ago, on the Ancient and Modern Agriculture of Peru. He stated, among other things of interest, that in the higher regions of the Andes, or what is called the Punos, where all the cereals of Europe refuse to grow, the only grain is that of a plant, called by the natives quinua. Very little is known of this hardy and valuable plant, which, there is good reason for believing, might be introduced in the colder districts of North America with great advantage. We subjoin what Mr. Squier said about it:

The only grain grown in these high, barren regions is the quinua or quinoa (Chenopodium Quinoa of the botanists). It belongs to the same same class of plants with the beet, spinach and sweet dock, and the grain is a wholesome, nutritive and not unpleasant article of food. Its leaves, while green, are used like spinach, and are quite equal to the spinach in flavor. The grain is cooked in a variety of ways, but more particularly in the chupe or soup (the universal dish of the Sierra), which it thickens, and to which it gives a slightly pungent flavor. It is sometimes boiled into a thick paste, and eaten with salt, or salt and butter, and with sugar. Sometimes, also, it is cooked with cheese and the aji pepper. Its light, dried stems are used for fuel, giving a quick, bright but fleeting flame—something of value, however, in a country where the dried dung of the llama and vicuña constitute about all there is of fuel.

The people of the Puna distinguish four varieties of the quinua, viz., Q. blanca, or white quinua, which has the largest grain; Q. real, which is very like the Q. blanca; the Q. ccoito or gray quinua; and the Q. cañagua, smallest of the varieties, but most hardy, and grows at the highest altitudes. I found the Q. cañagua at the apechita of Tiahuanaco, overlooking Lake Titicaca, 16,500 feet above the sea. It was not over five or six inches high on the average, but well spread out and loaded with seed or grain. Lower down it was larger, and on the islands in Lake Titicaca I found the Q. blanca four feet high, with stalks as thick as one's thumb.

The quinua produces largely, but I am unable to give even an approximate estimate of its yield per acre. It is a grain which, I am sure, might be introduced successfully in the colder, sandy and more arid regions of our own country, where the better grains will not flourish, among the Adirondacks and around Lake Superior, as well as in many parts of Canada, even into Labrador and around Hudson's Bay. The attempts to introduce it in Europe do not appear, from what I can learn, to have been very successful, principally, I believe, because it is not well liked as food; but there seems to have been no difficulty in its acclimatization. I know that it is grown in the vicinity of Marseilles, in France, where it reaches the height of six feet and upwards, and where its leaves are sought as an improvement on spinach.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—It costs $5 for a passport at the Niagara bridge to get into and out of Canada.

—— The heads of departments in Washington have given notice that henceforth clerkships will only be given to those who have served honorably in the Union armies.

—— A correspondent of the Montreal Gazette says that the ports of Canada are in a state of blockade. Windsor, Toronto, Hamilton, Kingston and Montreal are as effectually blockaded by the passport system of President Lincoln as they possibly could be by his gunboat system, should those gunboats ever be built.

—— The amount received for licences and fines by the Mayor's Marshal during the year ending 31st Dec., 1864, was $22,590, an increase of $4,500 over the previous year. The amount received by the Clerk of the Common Council for pawnbrokers', drivers, and other licences was $30,724 25. This is a falling off from previous years, which is accounted for by the fact that many of the principal lines of stages have been superseded by railroads.

—— The expenditure for school purposes last year exceeded the appropriation by $203,596, the greater part of which was expended in the erection of schoolhouses in the 4th, 7th and 8th Wards. The school property which has been acquired since 1842 is valued at $5,000,000.

—— From the report of the city dispensaries for the month ending Dec. 31, 1864, it appears that medical and surgical services, vaccination and medicine were afforded gratuitously to 8,697 persons. Of these there were visited and treated at their dwellings 1,821, at the dispensaries 6,878, and 905 were vaccinated; 15,037 prescriptions were gratuitously dispensed at the several offices, being an average of more than two to each patient. The principal causes of death were consumption and marasmus. The prevailing diseases chiefly affected the respiratory system. Among the most important were typhus fever, smallpox, pneumonia and diphtheria.

—— Sweden has made her mission a full one, having withdrawn Count Piper, her Charge d'Affaires, and appointed Count Audenfried, Minister Plenipotentiary.

—— There have been 379 marine disasters on the Lakes the past year.

—— It is proposed in Philadelphia to extinguish the fires in that city by contract; $75,000 a year is the sum named.

—— The Philadelphia Commercial List says a fortunate individual in that city owns $22,000 shares of oil stock, which cost $146,740, and is now worth $836,000, on which he has received, in nine months, 44 per cent., amounting to $96,800!

—— The plan is now generally adopted, in Grant's army, when burying the dead, to place in the grave with the body a sealed bottle, containing a paper on which is written the name and other particulars respecting the deceased.

—— Memphis papers say the British Agent from Liverpool at Corinth was paying 40 cents for cotton, part in gold and part in supplies. It is also stated that considerable cotton, failing to get within our lines, has been taken to Corinth.

—— The President has approved the joint resolution charging the President with the communication of a notice to the Government of Great Britain of the wish of the United States to terminate the Reciprocity of 1854.

—— Twenty-five years ago the United States produced only six thousand (6,000) bales of hops. Ten years later—in 1849—the production had increased to seventeen thousand (17,000) bales. The next decade shows a larger increase than in any other agricultural product, the growth of 1859 reaching fifty-five thousand (55,000) bales. These figures are official, derived from the United States census returns. The crop of 1862 has been estimated at eighty thousand (80,000) bales; a maximum which has not since been attained, and which may perhaps remain as a sort of "high-water mark," not very soon to be reached again. The yield of 1863 was estimated at sixty-five thousand (65,000) bales, much of it inferior; while that of 1864 is estimated at forty-five thousand (45,000) bales, with a larger proportion of inferior quality than disfigured the crop of 1863.

—— A propeller has arrived at Hilton Head from New York, with provisions for the destitute population of Savannah. The colored people there are receiving rations from the authorities, for which they give an equivalent in labor at the barracks, military offices and wharves. The white citizens are also well attended to by the commissary department and Major Arnold.

Western.—The Louisville Weekly Journal says: "The recent conduct of Col. Chivingston, commanding United States forces in Colorado, attacking a defenceless Indian village and perpetrating wholesale massacre of men, women and children, should excite for those poor creatures the generous pity of the nation, and we are gratified that it is to be subjected to Congressional investigation. The massacre is pronounced by Judge Harding, of Colorado, the most cruel that history records. He says that the 'Indians had previously given up their arms; they molested no travellers; they claimed to be quiet and peaceable; yet they were surprised by a military force coming some 200 miles for the purpose, at dead of night, and the victims included were men, women and children. Geo. Dent, son of Col. Dent, was killed, with a number of other half-breeds that were stopping at the lodges. Not a soul was spared—man, woman or papoose—that fell into the hands of the soldiers. The Indians no more expected an attack from the troops than they did from those at Fort Lyon, whom they visited every day.'" The decrease of this doomed race of red men is very rapid. In 1850 there were 400,000; in 1855 not quite 350,000; in 1860 the census returns 295,470. According to this ratio they will be an extinct race towards the end of the present century.

—— The prevalence of snowstorms in the North and West has been very remarkable. The Chicago papers say there has not been so much snow for many years. They consider it as the harbinger of a good harvest year.

—— The change of opinion in Missouri is most remarkable. In 1861 the State gave 152,345 votes for Proslavery candidate for Governor to 6,135 for the Republican candidate; last fall the Republican candidate polled 71,532 to 30,406 for the slavery one.

—— The Commissioner of the General Land Office has received intelligence of the discovery of rich and extensive silver mines in Washington Territory, along the western slope of the Cascade Mountains. The ore is represented as exceedingly rich, yielding about $700 to the ton. The lead, which has already been traced for more than four miles, is from seven to 14 feet thick. It is located about 50 miles north of Olympia. Miners are flocking in large numbers to this new El Dorado.

Southern.—The proceedings in the rebel Congress on the 16th January were very remarkable. They clearly reveal the rapid progress of disaffection and disorganization throughout the Southern Confederacy. The rebel President was severely handled. Mr. Orr, of Mississippi, cast bold defiance in his teeth, and Mr. Smith, of Alabama, withdrew from his seat, in disgust, at the management which, he avers, has brought ruin on the Confederacy. The confessions of Mr. Orr establish the fact that the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the peace propositions of the rebel Congress, reported unanimously in favor of sending Commissioners to sue for peace, and that this issue is rapidly disrupting the whole framework of the Confederacy.

—— The fall of Fort Fisher has deeply annoyed and surprised the Richmond press. The Enquirer calls it rather a misfortune than a disaster, which is drawing a very fine distinction. The Examiner boldly acknowledges its regret, and confesses that it closes the only great mouth of the Confederacy to Europe. The Whig vaunts that they can receive supplies through Mobile and Charleston.

—— The Richmond Dispatch is particularly angry with their Congress, saying: "Our armies have suffered disaster and defeat. A mighty host is encompassed within a few miles of the city. The thunder of his batteries shakes the walls of the Capitol. He does not hesitate to proclaim that it is his intention to enslave, to extirpate the whole race of which we are part and parcel. Our Congress is in session; bills of most urgent necessity are before it; bills vital to our Constitution and our country; bills upon the passage of which depend our status as freemen or slaves, probably for centuries to come. We are in the eighth week of the session; the enemy is prosecuting his enterprises throughout the winter. He allows our armies no rest day or night, and yet not one single step has been taken by our Legislatures for the renovating of our armies; for the amelioration of our currency; for the restoration of confidence to our people; for any object whatever that can have the remotest bearing upon our defence against the vengeance of our implacable enemies. They spend their time in talking, just as if the old days of log cabins and hard cider were here again."

—— The Congress at Richmond has ordered Mr. Foote, who was arrested while endeavoring to escape from rebeldom into the Northern lines, to be set at liberty.

Naval.—A letter from the Bahamas, dated at Nassau, N. P., the 16th of January, informs us that the utmost activity prevailed in the Anglo-rebel blockade running fleet plying between Wilmington and Charleston and Nassau. Cotton valued at $3,500,000 had been landed at Nassau from the above named Southern ports within 10 days. A large number of British trading vessels had sailed from Liverpool, London and the Clyde laden with supplies for the rebels. Their names and days of sailing are published in the Herald, so that our gallant sailors off Wilmington may have a fair chance of rewarding themselves liberally with the spoils of the common enemy. Two blockade runners cleared for that port at Nassau on the 14th inst. They have probably discovered before now, on arriving in New Inlet, that a change has taken place in the position of affairs there, and that they were just in time to fall into the hands of the National forces.

—— The monitor Patapsco was sunk off Charleston by a rebel torpedo at 2 o'clock one morning last week, and seven officers and about 60 of her crew were drowned.

—— The sloop-of-war Constellation, now riding at anchor in Hampton roads, having but lately arrived from a three years cruise in the Mediterranean, is one of the few relics left us of the days of sailing war vessels. The Constellation was launched in 1798. She is a sister ship of the Constitution, the "Old Ironsides," and is still seaworthy. She is commended by Capt. Stellwagen, of Philadelphia. The cruise from which the Constellation has just returned will, in all probability, be her last one, as she is likely now to be converted into an ordnance or practice ship.

Personal.—Capt. Robert Small, who surrendered the steamer Planter to our forces, and who is now in command of a United States gunboat, was turned out of the cars in Philadelphia, a few days ago, on account of his color.

—— The Louisiana Legislature has elected Governor Michael Hahn U. S. Senator from the 4th of March next.

—— Lieut. Davis, of the rebel army, was arrested at Newark, Ohio, a few days since. He was on his way from Canada to the South, via Washington. The importance of his capture consists in the fact, that he was for some time in charge of the prison at Andersonville where our brave soldiers suffered such torture.

—— Mr. Sumner has declined the invitation of the Massachusetts Legislature to deliver a eulogy before that assembly on the late Mr. Everett.

—— The Missouri Democrat denies that Gen. Singleton has gone to Richmond on a peace mission—he has merely gone to bring North two orphan nieces of his who are in destitute circumstances in that city.

—— For the satisfaction of the curious we reprint what the Newark Advertiser, of Monday, says: "George B. McClellan, Esq., of Orange, N. J., late Major-General of the army and Democratic candidate for the Presidency, was in Newark on Monday, and procured at the United States Collector's Office a passport to go to Europe in the steamer China. He also paid $195 75 war tax on an income of $3,915 during 1863. His pay as a Major-General last year was $4,173, and from other sources $342, amounting in all to $4,515, from which $600 deduction was made."

—— The Senate has confirmed the President's nomination of Gen. Alfred Terry as Major-General of Volunteers, and Brigadier-General of the U. S. Army.

—— Mocquard, the Emperor's late Secretary, has died worth nearly $4,000,000. A nice little sum to commence the new world on.

—— Admiral Romanoff, the once famous Russian sailor, is dead.

—— Madame Ristori is playing in Constantinople. The Sultan was so much charmed with her acting that he sent her an autograph letter and a diamond bracelet.

—— John Leech, the English Artist, left the whole of his property, amounting to £6,000, real and personal, to his wife, for her use absolutely.

—— The Boston Journal states that a statue to Edward Everett is already talked of, and the proposition will meet with general favor. The area in front of the State House, opposite to the Webster statue, would be an appropriate site for such a memorial of the orator, statesman and patriot.

—— Mr. George B. Lamar has at length taken the oath of allegiance to the Government. He is said to be much depressed in spirits, and more venerable in appearance than if a score of years had been added to his age since, in 1860, he left New York city.

—— It is not generally known that Gen. Sherman was entertained at dinner by the leading citizens of Savannah, among them Mr. Green. It is stated that the table was set in a princely manner. Not having plate enough to accommodate all the officers and guests, some of the more wealthy citizens provided additional silver pieces—a fact which indicates the popularity of Gen. Sherman.

Obituary.—Gen. Sterling Price, Ex-Governor of Missouri, died in Arkansas, about the beginning of December, of marsh fever. He was 63 years old, and a Virginian by birth.

—— Mr. Melvin S. Whitney, one of the most opulent and respectable merchants in New York, committed suicide on the morning of the 18th of Jan. Business troubles the cause.

—— Wm. H. Fry, the celebrated composer and journalist, died at Santa Cruz, on the 21st of Dec., aged 50.

—— Mrs. Tolman, of Richmond, New Hampshire, committed suicide last week, in consequence of her husband's death, to whom she was so much attached that she could not live without him.

Accidents and Offences.—A court-martial has been convened on board the steamboat Henry Burden, at Fort Lafayette, to try the Lake Erie pirate Capt. Bell and others, who were recently apprehended by our detective policemen. The hearing stands adjourned until the court-martial can secure instructions from the Secretary of War.

—— Charles H. Coon, a former citizen of Troy, New York, was killed at Chicago recently, by stepping into a vat of boiling hot lard in a pork-packing establishment. He was a steam-fitter by occupation, and was fitting pipes in that establishment when he met his death.

—— Mr. Gray, of New York, was killed on the 19th of Jan., by being caught in the machinery of a grain elevator in Brooklyn.

—— Mrs. Carr, of Eighth street, was run over by a First avenue car, and fatally injured, on the evening of the 19th of Jan.

Foreign.—The Provincial Legislature of Canada assembled on the 19th of January at Quebec. In Lord Monck's opening speech, he promises a Government bill to provide more effectually for the prevention of robberies committed by rebel refugees; and he also announces that the Federation scheme is designed to make British America an independent nationality.

—— The steamship Matanzas, from Havana, brings word that news had been received from Peru, via St. Thomas, leading to the belief that the Hispano-Peruvian question would be settled without any further difficulty. The news from St. Domingo was meagre. The Dominicans were still in force, and making vigorous hostile demonstrations.

Chit-Chat.—A coal-oil millionaire has named his little heiress Petrolia Ann. We suppose the next little heiress will be named Carrie Sene.

—— Gen. Weitzel has gone to Cincinnati to get married. "This additional proof of his courage was not needed," says the Express.

—— The Paris correspondent of the Morning Post says: "One of the most significant features in modern society in Paris is the ever augmenting number of persons afflicted with mental derangement."

—— The following report is from our friend Charles Green, of the Boston Post: "Fanny Brown has arrived at San Francisco, and her beauty seems to eclipse the merits of her acting."

—— A lady we know was startled the other day by being told that some one was waiting below for her "body." Dressmakers should be careful.

—— In Paris, an enterprising woman, Madame Robert, furnishes a dinner daily to 6,000 workmen for five sous each. Her bill of fare being cabbage soup, a slice of boiled beef, a piece of bread and a glass of wine.

—— James Street is 100 years old, and the oldest man in Wisconsin. He was married lately to a young widow of 88 summers.

OUR PATRIOT DEAD

BY EDWARD C. RIGGS

SLOWLY, and silently, tread round the graves,
Where now reposes the dust of our braves;
Nevermore heeding the cannon's loud roar,
Peacefully sleeping, their battles are o'er.

Side by side nobly, each one at his post,
Fearlessly facing the traitorous host;
Loving their country, they joined in the fight,
Gave their lives freely for Union and Right.

Thousands now mourn for their patriot dead—
Sweet, he their slumber and soft he their bed.

Gone from the battlefield to their long home,
Here their brave comrades who loved them will come,
Waving their battle-torn banner on high,
Vowing that Slavery and Treason shall die.
Thousands are mourning for noble ones slain;
Thousands have fallen, but fell not in vain;
Priceless the Union for which we contend—
Union where Justice and Liberty blend.

Thousands now mourn for their patriot dead—
Sweet be their slumber and soft be their bed.

While our dead heroes lie low in the tomb,
Slavery and Treason are meeting their doom;
Saved shall our country be—great though the cost—
Never forgotten the braves we have lost.
Gone from their victories calmly to rest;
Loved by their countrymen, honor'd and blest;
Sacred the sod o'er each patriot's grave—
God bless the country they struggled to save!
Fame a bright halo of glory shall shed
Over our sainted—our patriot dead.

THE HEIRESS OF BEACH COTTAGE.

BY HORATIO ALGER, JR.

CHAPTER I.

My earliest associations are with a small fishing hamlet, on what is known as the south shore of Cape Cod. Left an orphan at three years of age, I was adopted by my father's sister, an elderly spinster of thirty-five, who lived by herself in a small cottage built upon a slight eminence overlooking a sandy beach. What determined Aunt Mehitable to isolate herself from her relatives and set up her solitary household in such an out-of-the-way place I never clearly understood. I have heard vaguely that in early life her affections were fixed upon one who proved unworthy, and returned to her only to close up the fountains of her heart and implant in her embittered life a deep distrust of all her kind.

After purchasing this miniature cottage by the seashore a few hundred dollars remained to her, the interest of which, eking out her personal exertions, for her industry was untiring, enabled her not only to live without privation, but as comfortably as she could have desired. When my father's death threw me upon the world a penniless orphan, at the tender age of three, my aunt opened her doors to me. I can remember the childish awe, not unmingled with fear, with which I regarded my newly-discovered relative. She was tall and gaunt, and her face wore that uncompromising expression which warned me at the first glance that she would exact of me strict and unquestioning obedience. Yet she was kind in her way. Unfortunately, she lacked that sympathy with children which is needed to attract them.

I soon became accustomed to my life at Beach Cottage, for so in after years I designated my aunt's residence. The sea was to me a perpetual resource. I would sit for hours together upon the bank of pebbles, which it had required perhaps thousands of years for the sea to throw up and form into a natural rampart, picking out curious shells or stones which attracted my fancy from those massive debris. These at first I used to carry to the house in my apron till my aunt exclaimed impatiently:

"Prissy, child, what's the use of all this trumpery? It only litters up the room. You'd better fling it away."

There was a small plot of land attached to Beach Cottage. My aunt allotted to me use a small bed, which I bordered with the white stand smoothest pebbles I could find. These produced a very pretty effect. My aunt, whose esthetic nature had been little cultivated, contented herself with producing a few garden vegetables, and did not think it worth while to devote any time or space to flowers. I, who had all a child's love of the beautiful, obtained from a neighbor a few flower seeds of different varieties, and planted them as well as I knew how. Some of them struggled up through the arid and sandy soil, and in due time a few marigolds and other common flowers lifted their heads modestly from amidst their plebeian neighbors. Aunt Mehitable had not exchanged a word with me in regard to this innovation, and I hardly knew whether it met her approval or not. But one day she handed me a little parcel of seeds wrapped in a paper, with the remark:

"There, child, I've bought some new kind of flower seeds for you."

"Oh, aunt, where did you get them?" I exclaimed in delight.

"I bought 'em up to the store," she answered.

This I regarded with justice as a remarkable degree of encouragement on the part of my aunt. That she should actually spend money for what was not actually useful was a noteworthy deviation from her usual habits, and impressed me accordingly.

My life passed uneventfully enough till I was fifteen. Doubly isolated from the world through my aunt's unsociable temper, and solitary mode of life, and the quiet little village in which we made our home, I grew up to know little of the great outside world of busy and bustling activity and manifold interests which lay so near, and yet so far off from me. My educational advantages had been limited to twenty weeks' attendance each year at the humble district school, where the most advanced scholars seldom went beyond the rule of three. My aunt could teach me a little, having learned nothing that was not strictly utilitarian. I have no doubt that she regarded me, who had exhausted the narrow advantages of the district school, as possessing all the knowledge which I was likely to require.

THE REBELLIOUS PUPIL.

Until fifteen I was very much of my aunt's opinion. Greatness is relative, and I was in advance of the fishermen's daughters who were my school acquaintances. But about this time the Prudential Committee succeeded in obtaining as teacher of the winter school a student from Cambridge. I soon recognised the difference between him and the teachers to which I had been accustomed. Without intending it, he gave me a powerful sense of my own deficiencies, and opened to me glimpses of a great world of knowledge, of which I had hitherto had no conception. Then first I became inspired with an earnest desire to rise above the low level which had hitherto limited my aspirations. Yet there seemed little prospect of my gratifying my newly-acquired taste. For ten weeks our young instructor stopped with us, and then he was compelled to return again to his college duties. A brief time, but it was to alter the course of my future life.

Yet for the next three years there was no material change in my prospects. From the school I could hope to obtain nothing more. From the summer I obtained a few books, but he was an exception to his class, and though a good man was not much better educated than the people around him. I would have bought books, but had no money. My aunt, on whom I was dependent, owned but four books, viz: the Bible, Baxter's Saint's Rest, Pollok's Course of Time and the Almanac. These, which were sufficient for her intellectual needs, she judged sufficient for me also. I once timidly proffered a request that instead of a new dress, which she designed buying for me, she would get me a copy of Shakespeare's plays.

"Shakespeare!" exclaimed my aunt in amazement. "So you'd rather have a book written by a strolling actor than a new dress. I'm not going to throw away my money on such trash."

When I was eighteen my aunt was suddenly stricken down by a fever. Nature struggled obstinately against the disease, but the latter prevailed. A morning came when in unspeakable sorrow, and with a strange sense of loneliness, I stood beside the rigid form of my protectress, and knew that I was once more alone. It comforted me to think that I had never done anything knowingly to give her pain or uneasiness—that I had been dutiful to one who had been father, mother and all to me.

A will duly executed was found in my aunt's trunk, which left me sole heiress to whatever she might die possessed of. This comprised Beach Cottage with its furniture, and seven hundred dollars drawing interest in a savings bank.

After the funeral was over I sat down to consider what I should do—I could not with propriety continue to live alone in my aunt's cottage. My plane were soon determined upon. Providence had thrown in my way the means of gratifying the long and cherished wish which I had so long and vainly felt. I estimated that seven hundred dollars, with the accruing interest, would pay my expenses at a boarding-school for three years, at the end of that time I should be qualified to take a position as teacher or governess, and at the worst I should have Beech Cottage to fall back upon, where, if a higher vocation were denied me, I could settle down and gain my living as my aunt had done before me.

My determination excited some surprise among my village friends. They thought it a sinful waste to spend so much money on the mere acquisition of knowledge. I might marry within a year, and array myself like a princess. But I was not to be moved from my purpose. A month after Beech Cottage was closed, and I had committed myself with a boarding-school which had been recommended to me as combining superior advantages with very reasonable terms.

Over the next three years I pass rapidly. Some of them were a season of unalloyed happiness. A new world was opened to me wherein I wandered at will with all the enthusiasm of a first discoverer. Day by day I felt my intellect expanding and my faculties strengthening. At the outset, far behind those who were much my juniors, the distance between me continually diminished, until I found myself regarded as one of the intellectual leaders of the school. Pre-eminence in this department was the more readily accorded to me that I cared little for it. I sought knowledge for itself, not for any chance distinction it could bring me. Fortunately for me, my early life upon the seashore had confirmed a naturally strong constitution. Otherwise it could hardly have sustained the extraordinary drain I now made upon it.

When with the three months of graduating I imparted to Madame Lacour my desire to obtain a position as teacher or governess—could her influence help me?—she offered cordially into my plans. She told me that she had frequent applications for suitable teachers, and kindly assured me that she could recommend me with the utmost confidence.

Two months later I was summoned to her private room, and the following letter was placed in my hands. It bore a Virginia postmark:

"MY DEAR MADAME:—I am desirous of obtaining a governess for the children of ——. It is decided that she should be qualified to instruct in French, German and Italian, as well as the ordinary English branches. If you have any pupil in your institution whom you can recommend, you may offer her a salary of six hundred dollars per year.

"Will you confer an additional favor by apprising me when I may expect her?

"Yours respectfully, "PHILIP GRESHAM."

"Well?" asked Madame Lacour, when I had finished reading this epistle.

"I consider the offer a good one," I answered, promptly, "better than I had any right to expect. If you think me qualified I will accept it."

"I admire you for so do," said madame, kindly. "Had not this proposal come I intended to offer you a position here, but I could not offer you so favorable a one."

"Do not let that stand in the way, my dear teacher. If you really want me I will decline this proposal."

"No, my dear child, you must not sacrifice your interests. I should not feel it right to require it of you. It will be a more eligible position for you. When shall you be ready to start?"

"I will be guided by your advice."

"Let it be four weeks from to-day, then. You will require to make some additions to your wardrobe, so you will probably have little opportunity to do so on a Virginia plantation."

The next four weeks were devoted to supplying myself with a plain but abundant wardrobe. My employment left me happy and thoughts so busy that I had little time to speculate upon the new circumstances in which I was to be placed. Only when I finally started on my journey did a feeling of curiosity enter my mind as to my unknown employer. Speculation seemed idle, however, while I was to hold it upon. The character and disposition of my new pupil were of much more importance to me. Would she prove docile and tractable? If not here again I had without a guide me to 'a judgment. Soon I desisted from these fruitless speculations and began to look with interest from the car windows upon the landscape, of which my rapid transit had given me fleeting glimpses.

This was my first journey, and therefore had for me a charm which can never be afforded in an equal degree when the freshness and novelty of inexperience are passed. Under the present circumstance it was perhaps rash in me to journey alone, but there seemed to be no other way. Besides, I had a measure share of self-reliance, and was not in the least daunted by the difficulties that might be in store for me.

CHAPTER II.

The journey at length came to an end.

The cars stopped before a rude unpainted depot consisting of one room only.

I descended and my trunk was taken from the baggage-car and deposited on the ground. Again the cars started, and I found myself alone. Alone, for there was no one in or near the depot, and no house visible from it. It was drawing near nightfall, and I felt somewhat disturbed at my solitary position.

But I was not left long alone.

There was a clattering of wheels, and a waggon rapidly approached driven by a stout negro. He looked at me inquiringly.

"Be you Miss Laura Greyson?" he asked, doubtfully.

"Yes; I suppose you come from Mr. Gresham," I returned, much relieved.

"Yes, massa, I'm Massa Gresham's Pomp. I'm to tote you up to de house."

"Very well. Here's my trunk. You may put it into your waggon."

"All right, massa."

The trunk, though a heavy one, seemed but a trifle to him. While he was putting it in the waggon I climbed in and took my seat.

"Is the house far from here," I inquired.

"Bout three miles, massa. Massa Gresham come to Richmond yes'day."

"Will he be back soon?"

"Bout a week, massa."

"I'm glad of that. I shall not see my employer," I thought. "Perhaps it is as well. When he returns I shall be wonted to my place, and feel more at ease."

A mile farther on we came to a gate. Pomp descended and opened it. At his request I drove through. He shut the gate and resumed his place.

"Were on Maess Gresham's plantation now," he said.

"Is it a large plantation, Pomp?"

"Yes, massa."

"And how do he employ many——" I hesitated. "Many niggers, missus? Nigh on to two hundred."

After awhile we came in sight of the house. It was of two storeys, large upon the ground, with an ample verandah in front, after the fashion of the Virginia country houses.

As the wagon drove up in front of the house the door opened, and an elderly mulatto woman, stout and comely, made her appearance.

"Glad to see you, Miss Greyson," she said, in a phraseology free from the peculiarities of her race. "Massa Gresham yesterday some. My master was sorry he could not be here to welcome you."

"He has gone to Richmond, Pomp tells me."

"Yes; he was obliged to go up there for a few days on business. But you must be tired and hungry, Miss Greyson, supper is all ready if you will eat it."

I was very hungry, having had no regular dinner, and gratefully accepted the invitation. The eggs and bacon and hoe cake, which constituted the principal part of my meal, seemed to me delicious. Although this was but a housekeeper's repast, it seemed very much pleased with my evident appetite, appearing to consider it a special compliment to herself.

"Jist a little more, miss, it'll do you good," she urged.

I refused her pressing solicitations, and soon after asked to be shown to my room. It was a large square room in the front of the house, very neatly furnished, and looking into the old fashioned with a sigh of satisfaction. Though the unaccustomed surroundings might wall have kept me awake, fatigue overpowered every other consideration, and I was soon in a dreamless sleep.

When I awoke the bright sunshine irradiated my apartment. I looked upon it as a pleasant augury of success, and dressed myself cheerfully. After breakfast I expressed a desire to see my pupil.

Aunt Dolores, as I had learned her name was, entered the room, and I followed her.

"Here's your new missus," she said, addressing the occupant of the room.

"Is she going to have my own way now," said Helen, resolutely.

"Don't want any governess," was the angry reply, "and I won't have one. How dare you take hold of me!"

"Hush, Miss Helen, your governess will hear you."

"I don't care if she does."

Again there was a scuffle, but Chloe proved the strongest, and a minute afterwards, appeared, drawing a reluctant child of ten, who scowled at me by way of welcome.

"This is Miss Greyson, your governess," said Chloe. "Can't you tell her you are glad to see her?"

"But I'm not glad to see her," said the child determinedly.

"I hope you'll excuse her, Miss Greyson," said Chloe. "She's always had her own way."

"And I'm going to have my own way now," said Helen, resolutely.

"Then I hope it will be the right way," I said, with a smile.

Helen looked at me scrutinizingly.

"I don't like you," she said.

"Why not?"

"Because you have come here to plague me."

"Who told you so, Helen?"

"You'll make me study when I want to play."

"I must get acquainted with her before I can do her any good," I thought. So I said aloud:

"At any rate, I won't make you study to-day. Won't you?" I also asked, half suspiciously.

"No; I will help you play. Come and tell me how you amuse yourself."

After a little more, Helen concluded that I was in earnest, and approached me cautiously. I carelessly exposed my watch.

"Will you let me see your watch?" she asked.

"Yes, if you will be very careful of it. Come here, and I will show you how to open it."

In a very few minutes Helen was chatting merrily with me. She seemed to have forgotten that I was a governess. She told me confidentially about a beautiful bird's nest with three eggs in it, which she promised to show me.

"Have you a bird better than I expected," she said at length.

"I am glad of that. I think we shall be very good friends."

"Yes, it it wasn't for study. I hate books."

"You like better to play."

"A great deal."

"I don't wonder at it."

"You don't!" she said, in evident surprise.

"No. When I was of your age, I liked to play better than to study."

"Did you? Then what made you study?"

"Because I didn't want to grow up in ignorance."

"I reckon I'm very ignorant," said Helen, frankly.

"Did you never study?"

"Yes, a little."

"Can you read?"

"Yes—if the words are easy."

"Don't you want to know more?"

"It's too hard work, I reckon."

"Then we will make it easy. I wont expect much of you at first."

"Will you let me play some of the time?"

"Yes; and I'll show you some new plays."

"You will!" said Helen, in surprise and delight. I wondered you would be a hateful old thing, and plague me."

"I hope not," I answered, smiling. "Do you like me now?"

"Can you sing?"

"Yes, and play. Have you a piano?"

"Yes," said Helen, "but only there isn't anybody to make music on it. It's in the next room."

I followed Helen, and seating myself at the instrument, played and sang a few lively airs. The child leaned her chin on her hands, evidently deeply interested.

"That's jolly!" she said she. "I wish I could make music."

"So you can if you like."

"But it will take a long time."

"To play finely, yes. But it will not be long before you can play a little. Wouldn't you like to have such power?"

"I—I don't know. I'd rather hear you play. Will you play to me often?"

"Every day if you have got your lessons."

"Well, I guess I'll study. Do you know what I meant to do?"

"What was it?"

"I meant to plague you all I could, and not to study a bit."

"That was before you knew me."

"Yes; I'm glad you've come now. We'll have a good time together, I reckon."

Chloe, who had been in time to hear a part of this conversation, surveyed me with greatly increased respect, not unmixed with wonder. She could not understand how I had been able to acquire such a sudden influence over her wayward young minxes. I clearly understood, however, that I had gained much in Helen's affection, and that she would require peculiar management and a firm hand. Still, I never doubted my own success. Let me once win the confidence in my way invested my task with new interest. I thought I understood now why Mr. Gresham had offered me so liberal a salary. I determined that my services should be duly appreciated.

The next day I set my pupil to work. Several times she attempted rebellion, but failed. She never quietly ignored or overcame by a firmness greater than her own will. Within a week she was under very fair subjection.

One afternoon, her tasks having been satisfactorily performed, I was playing a few airs to Helen, when, happening to look up, I saw a gentleman standing in the doorway, listening to my performance. Helen noticed him at the same time.

"Papa!" she exclaimed, bounding towards him with delight.

He quietly kissed her, and then advanced to me.

"Miss Greyson, I presume."

I bowed.

"I regret not to have been here to welcome you to your new home. Let me make up for the involuntary omission now. I hope Chloe has made you comfortable."

"Entirely so, I thank you —I feel quite at home."

"I am very glad of that. How do you find your young pupil? Very ignorant, I'm afraid."

"Yes, she is backward for her age. But I see no lack of capacity. Ignorance is fortunately not an incurable disease."

"I hope," he continued, with a little anxiety, "you do not find her very intractable. I trust she has not given you very much trouble."

"On the contrary, we are already on excellent terms. She likes play better than study, which is not surprising, but I think she already begins to see that study is necessary."

He looked surprised and gratified.

"Helen, my child, congratulate his daughter, "I am glad to hear so good an account of you. I hope Miss Greyson will never have cause of complaint against you."

"I would not study with anybody else," said Helen; "that I like her. She tells me new plays and sings to me."

Mr. Gresham gave me a glance which gratified me, because it expressed appreciation of my services. I felt more drawn to him. He was rather above the middle height, easy and elegant in his manners, of dark complexion, and of considerable hair. I am not sure whether he would have been called a handsome man, but to me there was something very attractive in his face. He looked like a man of intelligence and unswerving fidelity. I should have accounted myself fortunate in having such a man for a friend. To be in his employ established me upon which I could not help thinking sprang not alone from politeness towards a dependent member of his household, but from a friendly interest in me.

There were so few of us that we were naturally brought into intimate relations. I soon discovered the fact that the distance between my employer and myself, and unconsciously acted with the entire sense of freedom, as if they were indeed my home. Mr. Gresham took it for granted that in so doing I were acting properly. But when I attempted to put on a more ceremonious air, it elicited from Mr. Gresham a look of surprise, which effectually dissipated my resolve.

Meanwhile, Helen made rapid progress. I succeeded in interesting her in her studies, and, being naturally quick, this was sufficient to insure rapid improvement. She had, besides, acquired an affection for me, which gave me great power over her.

So a year passed, a year of quiet happiness on my part, of frequently expressed satisfaction on the part of my employer.

One day, as I sat at the piano, playing a favorite air from "Favorita," Mr. Gresham entered the room.

"Helen is out with Chloe," I said, supposing him to be in search of his daughter.

"I know it," he said, quietly; "but it is not Helen I wish to see now."

There was something in his tone which made me look up suddenly. There was a smile upon his face and something in it which took me back. I hardly knew why, made my heart beat quicker.

"No," he repeated, "it was not to see Helen that I entered just now; it was to see you."

"Yes, sir."

"I hope you are happy here?" he said, abruptly.

"Very much so, sir," I replied.

"I am glad of that. We have tried to make you happy here."

"You are very kind."

"Do you think you could be happy here for—for a long time to come?"

"I am willing to remain here till Helen's education is completed."

"And then?"

"Then, I suppose, I shall return to the North.'

"Are you quite resolved upon that?"

"I have no intention of changing, Mr. Gresham," I answered, feeling more and more embarrassed.

"No, I suppose not. I will make my meaning clear at once. Do you like me any better?"

"Always? Helen will not need me."

"Not Helen, perhaps; but Helen's father will not deem your services, Miss Greyson, it is as my wife that I wish you to stay."

I was beginning to suspect this. Still it came upon me with a shock.

"I—I don't know what to say," I stammered.

"Take time, then," he said, kindly, "time to consider and decide. And I hope you will not decide that I ask you to become my wife because I love you as well as I should wish to love one who is to be my wife when exposed to me."

He lifted my hand to his lips respectfully, and in a tumult of feelings I left the room and sought my own apartment.

When the tumult of my feelings had somewhat subsided, I began to question my own heart. Did I love Mr. Gresham? I looked upon Mr. Gresham in the light of a lover. Our different stations would have prevented him, if nothing else. Yet when he exposed to me, the discovery of his feelings revealed to me the state of my own heart. I began to feel that I did love him. I felt instinctively that he was a man to whom I might safely confide my earthly happiness. I began to realise that if suddenly called to leave my new home, my sorrow at leaving my young would not be more poignant that I should feel.

When I descended the next morning, Mr. Gresham came forward and bent a look of earnest inquiry into my face.

"Yes."

I shall never forget the radiant look which illumined his face as he impetuously folded me in his arms and pressed a kiss on my brow.

"Papa!" was the surprised exclamation of Helen, who that moment entering the room surveyed the scene with open-eyed astonishment.

"Helen," said her father, "would you like to have Miss Greyson with you always?"

"Yes, indeed, papa, I would."

"So should I; and so I have asked her to become your mother."

"And will you, Miss Greyson?" asked Helen, eagerly.

"If you would like to have me," said I, smiling and blushing slightly.

"Then it's all right!" said Helen, joyously. "When are you going to be married? Will you give me a new dress for the wedding?"

"You shall have all you want," said her father, evidently gratified by Helen's approval.

"And I suppose we have a jolly time! I am going to tell Chloe."

I was about to interpose, but Mr. Gresham said, in a low voice:

"As it must be announced, perhaps Helen may as well do it."

In five minutes Chloe and all the house-servants were electrified by the information that Masse Gresham was going to marry Miss Greyson. Aunt Dolores was greatly pleased, and Chloe, in particular, could not contain her joy.

"It's the best news I've heard for a long time," she said. "You'll be a good mistress to us, and a good mother to young missus."

There were no lessons that day. Instead, I took a drive with Mr. Gresham. Another week or three of the neighboring planters, who bowed with an air of surprise at seeing me in the carriage.

"They will soon understand," said Mr. Gresham, turning to me with a smile.

CHAPTER III.

For many reasons it was decided that the marriage should take place almost immediately. I should have three months' holiday during which I should visit the North, but Mr. Gresham urged so strongly his and Helen's immediate need of me, that I could see no objections to be overruled.

It was arranged that the wedding should take place in a fortnight. During that time I made many purchases with a view to my new power. Mr. Gresham wished to furnish the bridal outfit, but on that point I was firm. I had more than enough saved from my salary, and I wished to come to him independent.

I was very happy; I felt that I had never before known what happiness was. There was a quiet feeling of rest and repose in the thought that henceforth I should have one to lean upon in all times of trial, one in every misfortune a strong arm to support me through life. There were no forebodings of evil, no fears that I should awake from my present bliss to find it but a dream. Yet clouds were gathering in my sky, and ere long they broke.

One afternoon I sat alone in the music-room, at work upon some portion of my bridal outfit. Mr. Gresham was absent for a day or two, and Helen was making a week's visit at the house of a cousin, chiefly to relieve me temporarily from her care.

Raising my eyes by chance, I started at seeing in the doorway the figure of a woman, gazing fixedly at me, with a pair of flashing black eyes.

The work dropped from my hands, and I started to my feet.

"Who are you?" I exclaimed, in surprise.

She slowly advanced, and seated herself.

"You have never heard of me?" she said, inquiringly.

"Never."

"No!" she returned, with a mocking laugh. "He has taken good care not to mention me."

"He! I don't understand you."

"The man you are about to marry."

"Mr. Gresham?"

"Yes. I repeat he has taken good care not to mention me."

"Why should he have done so? What are you to him?"

"Only his wife!" she said, looking at me with scornful triumph.

"His wife!" I ejaculated, in dismay.

"Yes; I am the wife of the man you are about to marry."

This declaration stunned me for a moment. Then my trust and confidence in Mr. Gresham returned. I would not believe it.

"You are seeking to impose a falsehood upon me," said I, sternly. "What is your object?"

"It is no falsehood. My object is to save you in time. If you neglect my warning, it is your own affair."

She spoke in such a semblance of sincerity that I knew not what to think. Finally, I said:

"What proof can you give me of your truth? You cannot expect me to credit your bare word against the knowledge that I have of Mr. Gresham's honor."

"You want proof. You shall have it. What do you say to this?"

She drew from the bosom of her dress a paper, which she placed in my hands. With a sinking heart I read the marriage certificate of Philip Gresham and Clara Holden. The document was dated eleven years back, and duly attested.

"Are you Clara Holden?" I asked faintly.

"I am Clara Gresham," she answered, significantly.

"How does it happen that you have lived apart from—from Mr. Gresham?" I could not call him her husband.

"I suppose we were incompatible," she said, laughing scornfully. "At least he said so. He conceived a hatred for me, and as the readiest way to rid himself of me, imprisoned me in a lunatic asylum. You shudder; well you may. Perhaps the same fate may be in store for you when he tires of you. I eluded the vigilance of my keepers, and here I am in time to give you warning. You had best heed it."

She rose and left me.

I remained stupified. I did not wish to believe, yet how could I help it. There was the marriage certificate, there was, besides, a resemblance between this woman and Helen. There seemed no chance for doubt.

What should I do? There was but one way. I must go away, and that at once, before Mr. Gresham returned.

In feverish haste I packed my trunk, and then wrote a few lines to Mr. Gresham, in which I calmly mentioned the discovery I had made. I added no comment. I felt that none was needed. This I sealed and proposed to hand to Chloe for her master. I sent for her and Pomp, and saying briefly that I was compelled to go away suddenly, asked Pomp to drive me to the railway station.

Chloe's astonishment was unbounded.

"What will master say?" she ejaculated.

"Here is a note which I wish you to give him when he returns."

"Will you be long gone, Miss Greyson?" she asked.

"I—I don't know. The letter will tell," I answered, evasively.

"You will be back in time for the wedding?" persisted Chloe, still far from satisfied.

"I think the wedding will have to be postponed," said I, as calmly as I could, for I did not wish Chloe to suspect the truth. It would have been well if I had confided in her.

She looked at me as if she did not quite understand, but aided me in my preparations, while Pomp harnessed the horse to the carriage.

Within half an hour I was on my way from the house where I had spent many happy hours to the railway station. An hour later, and I was hurrying North as fast as steam could carry me.

CHAPTER IV.

I WISHED to go somewhere where I could be quiet. The sudden revelation of Mr. Gresham's baseness had startled and shocked me to such an extent, that I felt the absolute need of time to recover from it. It was natural that I should think of the humble home which I had shared with my aunt.

It was at the close of a dull November day that I descended from the stage at my own door. The house was dumb and silent, and wore the solitary look which an unoccupied house soon gets. But inside all was as I had left it, even to a basket of wood which stood beside the kitchen stove.

I soon built a fire, and the cottage rapidly assumed a more cheerful look.

"And this," thought I, "is to be my home. Here I am to lead a solitary, unloved existence. Well, since Providence has so ordained, I will try to bear it."

The next day I received visits from my neighbors. In spite of their kindness, they could not help betraying some curiosity about my past life and my motives for returning. My replies were vague, and I have no doubt unsatisfactory. However, their questions ceased, and I was left to myself.

I soon found that I had mistaken my needs. I required not rest but a change. This I could not find in the aimless life I was leading. Occupation was necessary to me.

I learned that the village school, about to open for the winter, was without a teacher. I presented myself to the Prudential Committee, or school agent, and offered my services. My offer was thankfully accepted. I fancy the agent drove a hard bargain with me as regards compensation, but as I wanted work not money, I paid little heed to that. Within a week I found myself in charge of fifty scholars of all ages and sizes. I could no longer complain that I had nothing to occupy me. I soon became interested in the advancement of my little flock, and during six hours daily at least I had no chance to think of Mr. Gresham. My mind became less morbid and more healthy. There is no panacea for grief like a definite aim and a fixed employment.

So two months passed. The quarterly examination was approaching, and this gave me even more than usual to think of. One day, as I was hearing a class in geography, there was a knock at the door. I sent one of the older girls to ascertain the business of the visitor.

"A gentleman wishes to see you, Miss Greyson," she announced.

Book in hand, I advanced to the door. The visitor had withdrawn a little to one side, so that I had to go out into the entry to see him.

A faint feeling came over me as I recognised Mr. Gresham.

He advanced to meet me eagerly, with hands outstretched, but I motioned him back. I had not forgotten, even in the joy of meeting him, the obstacle that parted us.

"Shut the door," he said, in a low voice. "I wish to speak to you."

Mechanically I complied.

"Laura," he said, "I have been long in finding you. How could you leave me?"

"How could I do otherwise? Surely you read my letter?"

"Yes. And you believed that woman's story?"

"I did not wish to. I doubted till I saw the marriage certificate."

"Yet, Laura, that woman was never my wife."

"But the resemblance to Helen," I said, in bewilderment.

"Is easily explained. She is Helen's aunt—her mother's sister. The marriage certificate was genuine, but she had taken it from her sister's desk after her death."

"What could have been her object?"

"To prevent our marriage."

"Why should she wish to prevent that?"

"I will soon explain. You will not charge me with vanity when I say that, even at the time I married my first wife, Helen—for that is her name—manifested a partiality for me, and I have reason to believe would gladly have married me in her sister's place. When Clara died, Helen's hopes revived. She went so far as to make advances to me which I could not misunderstand. This obliged me to treat her with a cold formality which should discourage her in any hopes she might have cherished. You will easily understand how a jealous woman should have been impelled to step in between me and another as soon as she became convinced that that other had succeeded where she had failed."

"Can this be true?" I asked in surprise and relief.

"You need not fear that I am deceiving you, Laura. You might have known before, had you questioned Chloe, that this woman could have no claim upon me."

"I never thought to ask her; I was so overwhelmed by the sudden revelation, that I only wanted to hide myself somewhere."

"So you came here. When will you be ready to go back? Shall it be to-morrow?"

"But my school."

"Confound the school!"

"I must stay till the term closes. That is next week."

He tried to dissuade me, but on that point I was firm.

When the examination was over I closed Beach Cottage once more and returned to Virginia, this time as Mrs. Gresham. The marriage ceremony was performed in Boston.

"I must make sure of you this time," said Mr. Gresham. "Till you become my wife I shall be uneasy lest you suddenly vanish, leaving behind merely a brief note to account for your departure."

"I will stay with you till you get tired of me," I answered, smiling.

Three years later the rebellion broke out. My husband, espousing the Northern side, was compelled to abandon his property and flee to the North. Fortunately he had a few thousands deposited with a banker in New York. Again we are established at Beach Cottage, considerably enlarged from what it was in my aunt's day. How long we shall live there I do not know. Whether my husband will ever regain his former large possessions I cannot tell. Despite the sacrifice, I am glad that he has espoused the side of truth and loyalty, and that while these civil commotions last my aunt's bequest provides us a comfortable home in Beach Cottage.

A MISSOURI postmaster thus expresses his opinion that his official returns are correct: "I hereby certify that the four goin A Counte is as neer Rite as I now how to maik it if there is eny mistake it is not Dun a purpers."

THE natives of Australia are a simple race; their superstitions are curious. They believe that after death they return as white men. One of them, hanged at Melbourne, said, "Never mind, I jump up white fellow, with plenty of sixpence."

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE news of the fall of Savannah had reached London, and produced a great sensation. The London Times had an article praising Gen. Sherman in the highest terms. The effect upon the rebel cotton loan had been very great, immediately resulting in a decline of 10 per cent. Altogether the feeling in favor of the North was becoming more and more friendly—this had been enhanced by the President's revocation of Gen. Dix's order relative to raids from Canada. Nevertheless, Gen. Dix's order had produced the desired effect. The British Government see that the North will not be trifled with, and hence the changed aspect of the Canadian Governmental countenance.

At the usual New Year's reception of the diplomatic corps by the Emperor, the Papal Nuncio offered the good wishes and felicitations of that body for the coming year. The Emperor replied as follows:

"The felicitations of the diplomatic corps, of which you are good enough to be the mouthpiece, touch me sensibly. I trust that that concord may continue to reign among us of which your presence around me is a sure guarantee. Be convinced that I will make every effort that my relations with foreign powers be ever animated with respect for right and love of peace and justice."

A frightful accident had occurred at a musical entertainment in Dundee, and 19 persons were killed.

The British Government has began to show more alacrity in carrying out their neutral duties, having caused the arrest of Capt. Corbett, who took the rebel pirate Shenandoah to Madeira. The arrest was made under the Foreign Enlistment act.

The main portion of the Pope's Encyclical, with the whole of its appendix, has been condemned by the French Government. The prelates of France were about to warn Pius the Ninth of the dangerous feeling evoked by the document.

The Italian press declares it to be a gross attack upon the civilization of the age.

Marsden and Wormwald were interrupted by the police when about to fight for the championship of England on the 3d inst. The battle came off next day, and Wormwald was declared the victor after 10 rounds. Marsden was dreadfully punished.

TOWN GOSSIP.

IF we were to commence our gossip of each week with that topic which seems to sit nearest the hearts and nearest the pockets of a majority of New Yorkers, we should be on a perpetual song of petroleum. In certain circles petroleum is eaten, drank and slept with. The lucky speculator who, a few months since, found it something of a task to keep up with the demands of his landlady and washerwoman, to-day luxuriates in a brown stone front and drives the neatest team in town. We can cite an instance of a lucky friend of ours who, having faith, said unto himself, "Here have I been in business eleven years, working day and night, and at this moment my capital is no larger than when I began, and I have realised nothing but the support of my family. I will sell out and invest in petroleum." And straightway he did sell out, and $28,000, all that he was worth in the world, did he put in petroleum stock with a certain company—which shall be nameless, because we are not owners of stock in it—at the nominal sum of $3 per share. Within one month after the investment was completed the said company "struck ile" on Pitt Hole Creek, and one well sent forth an average of nearly 300 barrels per day. Under these circumstances our friend, dazzled with various offers, sold out his 9,350 shares, and pocketed the neat little sum of $412,050 as the result at $43 per share, at which price, or above it, the stock still stands, all of which is a true story, and capable of proof.

There is one satisfactory point in this oil fever, which is that it has a solid foundation. That the strong probability is success for every company that is managed honestly and fairly. There are at this moment seven or eight hundred wells being bored in Pennsylvania alone, the majority of which will be finished in a month from this time. It is very unlikely that all of these will produce, but the production will be immense; and there will be one satisfactory point connected with it, which is, that the material will hold its price, even in the face of this wondrous production, for the simple fact that every day adds to its uses, and, consequently, to its demands. Should it come fast enough, another year or two will see petroleum used for heating our houses, cooking our dinners, running our steamboats, and, in fact, performing all the work that fuel now does.

In this city we can hear little of the excitement of the oil regions. One day a man is a bankrupt; he has spent all his pile in securing a lot of ground or a lease of one, and sinking a well, which is, so far, unproductive. The next day he is a millionaire, his well is flowing, perhaps two or three hundred barrels a day, and he is, consequently, in receipt of an income of, say, $3,000 per diem, or a million a-year. Some of these things seem like castle-building, but, fortunately for those concerned, they are hard, solid facts.

There is but one point for those who have a little money to invest in petroleum stock to look warily at, which is—that they do not fall into the hands of mere speculators or, perhaps, swindlers. Any company organised on straightforward business principles, and having oil territory, cannot fail to pay. It has been under this belief that we have heretofore spoken of the New York and Liverpool Company, and recommended it to those about making investments, no matter how small or how large the amount. It is an honest, well-conducted company, and is on the threshold of great successes, with some of its wells already in splendid flow. Its President, the Hon. Daniel S. Dickinson, is too well known to require a word from us, and is a surety that every transaction of the company will be conducted on the highest business principles. They own over 2,000 acres of land in the very heart of the oil districts, and when the wells now sinking are finished, which will be in about a month or six weeks, it is a reasonable supposition that its stock will be unattainable in the market at less than five or six times its regular price, which is now $10 per share, $5 paid cash.

Having said which, with the benevolent idea that if our readers will seek lucre and get rich by striking oil, we cannot do a more wholesome act than to point out the proper road, we will now shut down on petroleum for the week, promising that whatever turns up that is new and interesting on the subject to record it.

Last week we gossiped a little about the records of the income tax, and gave one or two of its revelations, and this week, as the matter is still fearfully exciting all upper-tendom, we think we cannot do better than give a little more of it. We all have a curiosity to know something about our neighbor's prosperity, and are certain to over-estimate it. We mentioned that Stewart, the drygoods man, was estimated at nearly two millions per annum, but we should have explained that this was not an income from tangible property, but from a successful business done within the year, strongly increased by the rise of goods held by him. Our present Mayor, C. Godfrey Gunther, shows an income of only $13,400, while Opdyke, ex-Mayor, ex-gun contractor, foots up to the comfortable sum of $112,800. The man who has been monarch of the Stock Exchange for the past year, Leonard W. Jerome, makes a showing of $100,000, a small sum it seems to us to support the magnificence of the autocrat's living, his splendid teams, his private theatre, and various similar luxuries. August Belmont, who, by his successful banking operations, and his connection with the Rothschilds, has always been considered very rich, foots up only at the insignificant sum of $100,900 per annum—scarce enough to pay for gloves and cigars. Peter Cooper owns to $106,879, and Gen. John A. Dix puts in an admission for the princely income of $4,250, which we suppose must be independent of his pay as a Major-General, from which Government collects tax on its payment. If this is not so, and so useful a man has only this sum to live on in these days, it simply argues that honesty is bad policy, and that while the citizens of New York are presenting U. S. 10-40's and fine houses to Generals in the field, they will do well to look nearer home, to those who are performing most arduous and thankless service at their very doors. Robert Bonner, of Ledger fame, declares himself only the possessor of an income of $25,000 per annum; while another man in the literary line—W. H. Appleton—puts his at $65,147, which proves that something tangible has come out from authors' brains.

The highest income reported for a physician is about $16,000, the highest lawyer's at $28,000, less than that of one of our fashionable tailors, who reports for a fraction over $30,000. The mercantile community, of course, report the highest, but the incomes made purely from business rarely go above $100,000, those larger than this coming from tangible property, real estate, stocks, etc.

The week has been one of skating and sleighing, such as New York has not seen for many a long year. So much of the last has there been that the highly marketable commodity a sleigh and team, which in the beginning could not be looked at less than $100 a day, has come down to the highly reasonable price of about $50. The roads about the city and even the streets of the city have been alive with them, and New Yorkers have for once had a surfeit of snow. We may say the same of ice if we may judge by the falling off at Central Park, or perhaps this falling off may be attributable to the infamous swindling and annoyances perpetrated on all visitors there. It is worse than Niagara or Saratoga, where one cannot move three steps without being swindled or annoyed. At Central Park everything one gets to eat or drink is of the very worst description, and charged at prices exceeding the most extravagant city restaurants by 33 per cent. Thirty cents is the price of a couple of oysters swimming in dirty liquor and called a stew; 10 cents for a bit of cake that can be bought in any bakers for two; 10 cents for a quarter of what is undoubtedly a six cents pie; 10 cents for a sandwich of a size that would allow any person to starve to death while eating. In fact, the whole thing and everything connected with it is an imposition, and should be corrected by the authorities. To do this we see no better plan than throw the matter open to competition, under restrictions, and then we are convinced the visitors to Central Park will be able to get something decent and "warm to take," as Solon Shingle says, without being mulcted in a sum beyond the ability of any honest man to pay.

Among the items connected with that most important subject to the whole community, recruiting, is one about which we feel constrained to say a word. We know of course that all the sympathies of the people are on the side of the recruit, as they ought to be, and not upon that of the broker and speculator in men; but there are so many phases of the matter that while it is hardly worth while to cite individual instances, we will say that the fault is not always on the side of the man who attempts to speculate in the bounty value of flesh and blood for the army. Laws have been made, not to protect the recruit, but to put a market value on him, and as a consequence to throw him into the hands of whoever will pay the highest price. The instance we would cite is that of a man named Shaw, who brought over in the ship Great Western a large number of Englishmen. These men were ostensibly shipped as glassblowers, though none of them were of that occupation, and all of them well understood the errand they were coming on, which was to enlist in the army of the United States, for a certain stipulated bounty which Shaw had promised them. On arriving in this country the men soon found out, through the runners and harpies that continually prowl around Castle Garden, that they could obtain more than the sum promised by Shaw, and repudiating the fact that for several weeks he had supported them and paid their passages, stood ready to sell themselves to the highest bidder. The bidder was not long wanting, and appeared in the shape of a New York County Supervisor, who offered the men $650 cash each to enlist as substitutes. The men, of course, as nine men out of ten will do when money is in question, and no legal restriction is upon them, left Shaw and enlisted for the larger sum, while Shaw, who had spent the last cent he had in the world upon them, was entirely disregarded in the transaction, and as a resource against poverty enlisted himself. Now we fail to see the honesty of this transaction, and declare that though Shaw may not have been engaged in what the world looks on as a perfectly reputable transaction, yet he was justly entitled to remuneration for his expenses in bringing these men, and it was a shame and a disgrace, as long as we have made laws and advertised them creating man a merchantable commodity, to repudiate the contract when it is undertaken to be carried out. If Shaw was entitled to nothing more, he certainly was to the $50 hand money so freely promised by our recruiting supervisors.

For the week there is positively nothing to record in theatricals. The same pieces we have chronicled for weeks past are still on the carpet, and as far as we are able to judge are likely to remain there. It seems strange to us that if we are to keep open a half dozen theatres for the benefit of country people, who are perpetually content with old things because they have just arrived in town that day, why we cannot have one for the benefit of New Yorkers, who want some change and object to seeing the same thing more than 12 times.

There has been no change for a week, and not even a new sensation outside the theatres on which we can bestow a word. Such a state of things is to the utter disgust of dramatic critics, who, feeling that their occupation is gone, are dreadfully afraid that their salaries will be in the same condition. Will the managers please mark this fact and act according?

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

"MARRIAGE," said a fretful husband, "is the graveyard of love."

"Yes," replied his wife, "and you men are the gravediggers."

THE poet Whittier wrote, in "Maud Muller"—

> Of all sad words of tongue or pen,
> The saddest are these, "It might have been."

A later writer, mindful of the many good things that people think of saying when it is too late to say them, writes:

> Oh, of all sad thoughts when the moment is fled,
> The saddest is this, "What I might have said!"

THE fierce temper of Lord Brougham is well known. Sydney Smith one day observing his lordship's carriage, on the panel of which appeared a "B" surmounted by a coronet, said to a friend, "There goes a carriage with a bee outside, and a wasp within!"

MCARONE, of the Leader (Mr. Geo. Arnold), is often pungent in his hits at passing events. Commenting recently on the conflicting and uncertain newspaper accounts of the whereabouts of Gen. Sherman, he reported the "spirit of the press" as follows:

"The Richmond papers evidently know all about Sherman's movements, and a good deal more.
The Enquirer says he is near Milledgeville.
The Examiner says he is near Millen.
The Whig says he is near Augusta.
The Dispatch says he is near Savannah.
The Sentinel says he is near-sighted."

A LAD wishing to turn sailor, applied to the captain of a vessel for a berth. The captain wishing to intimidate him, handed him a piece of rope end said:

"If you want to be a good sailor, you must be able to make three ends to that rope."

"I can do it," readily responded the boy; "here is one, and here is another—and that makes two. Now, here's a third"—and he threw it overboard.

FIRST ASSAULT UPON FORT FISHER, SUNDAY, JAN. 15—THE 117TH NEW YORK TROOPS, FOLLOWED BY THE 3RD, PLANTING THE FLAG ON THE NORTHERN TRAVERSE OF THE FORT.

AFTER LONG YEARS.

BY W. T. LEE.

I HAVE come back again to my dear native village,
Where father and mother and sister reside;
I've been wandering away, oh, so many long years,
While friends have grown old and loved ones died.

Let me think—'twas in March, dark, weird and gloomy,
When in anger I turned from the comforts of home—
Twenty years to a day—a chair by the fireside
Seems so far away to this who's no longer alone!

Yes, they welcomed me back to my place in the circle,
And spoke loving words—words far sweeter to me
Than the low mellow music of zephyrs that flutter
The leaves of the forest or ripple the sea.

I almost forget, in this fresh gush of gladness,
That I've ever been unhappy—that the great world is cold;
I feel not the weight of the years' noiseless fleeting,
Nor can believe for a moment I've grown so old.

I'm so happy to-day that each dim recollection
Seems to roll from my brow a marked furrow of care;
Each memory's a star in the pure sky of fancy,
So bright as to dazzle each grief in its glare.

Father and mother and sisters, forgive me—
No'er again will I leave you in anger to roam,
Two decades of long years the lesson have taught me
That contentment's a virtue found only at home.

ONLY A CLOD.

JULIA DESMOND led a very pleasant life, and there were people who said that the colonel's daughter was the most fortunate person; but the Julia herself there was just one drop in the cup which was bitter enough to change the flavor of the entire draught. This was that Maude Hilary. That was Miss Desmond's grand grievance. She brooded over it sometimes when she brushed her hair of a night before the big mock-gorgeous in her pretty chintz-curtained-chamber at the Cedars. Maude had two shovel glasses that swung upon hinges at each side of her dressing-table, and Maude had her own maid to brush her hair, but Julia was fain to smooth her own dark tresses.

Miss Desmond thought of her grievance very often of a morning, when she contemplated her face by the light of a pair of wax candles, and pondered upon the events of the day. She was not Maude Hilary. She was not sole heiress to one of the largest fortunes—so ran the common rumor—ever won by city merchant. She had not received half the settlement that had been bestowed upon Miss Hilary during that day. And if not, why not? Was it because she was less good-looking? Certainly not. Miss Desmond was a handsome girl, with bold, striking features, and her black eyes flashed indignation upon the other eyes that the glass of the most fastidious of any personal expericrity on the part of Maude Hilary. Was it because she was less accomplished? Not that. Where Maude was the strongest and did most execution in a fantasia by Thalberg? Whose right little finger was cleared and steadied in a prolonged shake? Whose figure in a water-colored sketch stood firmest on their legs? Miss Desmond's, of course.

But Maude was rich and Julia was poor, and the meanness of mankind was testified by the absurd devotion which they all exhibited for the heiress. Julia was truly fond of Maude, and thought her tolerably pretty; but she did not comprehend the grand fact that Miss Hilary was one of the most fascinating of women, and that she herself was not. She was handsome and stylish, and accomplished and well-bred, but she was not bewitching. When Maude spoke in a friendly manner to any masculine acquaintance, he was apt to be seized with a mad impulse that prompted him to kiss her there and then in the eternal banishment of all her divine presence would be his immediate doom. Even women had something of the same feeling when Miss Hilary used to them; and perhaps this may be attributed to the fact that her mouth was the best and most expressive feature in her face. Such heavenly smiles, such innocently and unconsciously bewitching variations of expression played perpetually about those lovely rosy lips, that the hardest woman-hater might have been betrayed into the admission that amongst nature's numerous mistakes Maude Hilary's creation was an inexcusable one. Fortune-hunters who came with mercenary aspirations, remained to be sincere. Rich young stock-brokers who speculated amongst themselves upon the value of Lionel Hilary's wealth, would have gladly taken Maude to wife, "ex everything." But Julia Desmond could not understand all this, and she regarded her benefactor's daughter as a feminine image of the golden calf, before which mercenary mankind bowed down in servile worship.

The two girls seated themselves in the little temple, and the worshippers came round and performed their homage. But Miss Hilary had assumed lower with considerable resignation. Was she not Miss Hilary—bright and hopeful creature? and had she not from babyhood inhabited a kind of fairy circle, separated from all the common order world by a golden boundary, sheltered from every rude breath of heaven by a limitless canopy of banknotes?

CHAPTER VIII.—AT THE CHATEAU DE BOURBON.

THE château in which some of the banished descendants of Louis the Great had set up their household gods in the shape of a most expensive collection of artistic treasures, was only a mile or so distant from Mr. Hilary's house. It was an old red-brick mansion like the Cedars; and indeed, the banks of the Thames seem specially rich in red brick mansions of the early Georgian period. It was a roomy old house, and has extended itself of late years on either side, until it was almost painful of aspect. It was a very pretty house, and looked glowing with art treasures, about almost every one of which there hung a history as interesting as the object itself. Royalty, the banished royalty of France, inhabited that simple suburban mansion, and on the smooth lawn where the pennants were flying and the band playing, a quiet-looking gentleman moved about among the visitors, whose grave and noble face was the exact reproduction of another face, to be seen in stained marble under a glass case within the mansion. The face of a gentleman who, in the course of an adventurous career, won some little distinction under the style and title of Henry IV., King of France and Navarre.

It was almost like going back into the past for an hour or so to lounge on that sunny lawn of Frederickstone, and to see so familiar were some of the names that were heard on the lips of the crowd. There was a mournful kind of interest in the Bourbon blood. In the sprout of the pretty flower-festooned marquees, where elegant women were charging fabulous prices for an ice, and where every one in a way of duchin were recalled the image of tented plains and fields of cloth of gold, in the days when the sons of St. Louis had clear and undisputed high-swearing business in this world than such gentle works of charity as occupied them pleasantly enough to-day.

Maude Hilary was in her glory in the gardens of the Château de Bourbon. She had plenty of every one's money for once in her way; a certain bundle of five-pound notes, which her father had brought from the city on the previous evening; and she distributed her wealth freely among the inhabitants of the stalls, keeping herself and her attendant cavaliers with wax dolls and Berlin wool work, stereoscopes, antimacassars, painted flowerpots, bottled cowslip wine, and feather flowers. She knew a great many people, and she was so bright, and animated, and happy-looking, that a great many more strangers came to her watched her with a feeling of interest, and asked one another who she was. She was standing upon a piece of smooth sward in the extreme open the terrace overlooking the river, when she cried out that her papa had arrived, and ran away to meet him, leaving Julia Desmond and the two young men behind her.

"An hour after your time, papa," she said, putting both her arms round his neck and I've spent all my money, and I've bought these for you." She flourished a pair of gorgeously embroidered slippers before her father's face, and put her arm through his with an air of proprietorship that was as charming as—everything else she did.

Lionel Hilary, Australian merchant, of Moorgate street, was a man of a handsome looking man, tall, and stout, and dark, with iron-gray hair and whiskers, and very unlike his daughter in every respect but that of brightness. This was the chief element of her beauty found no reflection in his face. He looked very grave and a little anxious; and Maude, watching him closely, said presently:

"I'm afraid you have one of your headaches again to-day, papa."

"Yes, my dear; I've been working rather hard this morning. Let me introduce you to this gentleman, Julia. He has promised to come and spend a little of his money for the benefit of the duchess's poor people."

This gentleman was Mr. Francis Tredethlyn, who had been loitering a little in the rear of Lionel Hilary while the merchant talked to his daughter. He had been introduced and acquainted with each other in the simplest possible manner. Amongst the property Francis Tredethlyn had inherited from his mother were shares in a very large and Australian insurance company of which Mr. Hilary was a director. Francis, wanting to make some money, had written to the latter, who was up to him, and had done so. He found the merchant very cordial and friendly—he had found him so from the first—and the disposition prepossessed him lately—and with the frankness natural to him had told a good deal of his story to that gentleman, who had listened to it with the utmost attention. Lionel Hilary, being very much pleased with his manner, and being generally very kind and hospitable to any young gentleman who came in his way, had offered to drive his new acquaintance down to Twickenham.

Francis Tredethlyn was a London miserably dull at this time of the year," he said. "There's a fête, or a fancy fair, or something of that kind, our way. I'll run you down, and you shall dine at my place afterwards."

Thus it was that Francis Tredethlyn found himself standing by Maude Hilary's side in the garden, making what he felt to be a very awkward bow, and most heartily wishing that some convulsion of nature might open a ready-made grave in the smooth turf on which he stood, wherein he might hide himself from the bright eyes of Miss Hilary.

She spoke to him in the easiest, friendliest manner; asked him if he had ever been at the château before; if he liked a fancy fair; hoped he meant to spend ever so much money. She opened her eyes very wide as she said this, and he saw how blue they were, and then felt an actual blush kindling under his brown skin. Such a woman as he had never before walked his side, talking to him and smiling at him. He answered her animated inquiries as best he might, and found himself thinking of all manner of incongruous things—of Maude Hilary's handsome face and lace parasol, of his own awkwardness and ignorance, of the narrow points of her glove-stitched boots, as they peeped from under her dress and then, like anything in the world you like except Sir John Suckling's mice, of the old farmhouse on the Cornish moorland, of little Susy in a white dimity sunbonnet.

He had never been in such a place before, misplaced as he undoubtedly was with well-dressed men and women, about most of whom even he, in despite of his ignorance, recognised a nameless something that placed them infinitely above the pretensions of well-dressed people. That in itself was enough to bewilder him. He had never before seen such a woman as Maude Hilary; and even experienced young men from Government offices found Maude Hilary bewildering. He felt terribly embarrassed and out of place, and after undergoing a sharp ordeal on the terrace, where he was introduced to Miss Desmond and to the two young men staying in the house, he felt as if he must escape from himself free for a few minutes, while Mr. Hilary and his daughter talked to a group of new arrivals. He strolled away to the edge of the terrace, and lounged upon the marble balustrade, looking down at a lace helow, a kind of gorge cut through the sloping grass-plot, in which a band of common folks of the neighborhood were gathered, listening to the music of the band, and staring at the fine people, and at the carriages waiting for the guests in the garden above.

"I didn't think I was such a fool as to let my brains be muddled like this by a few fine dresses, and parasols, and flowerbeds, and the playing of a brass band," he thought; "they're dead and buried, and the smell of sea-weed is in my nose. She's fresh and blood, just as much as my mother that's dead and gone, or poor little Susy. But then I looked at her just now, I suppose as if there was a light shining all about her somewhere, that almost blinded me. She spoke to me as kindly as she spoke to her father or Julia Desmond, and yet I felt more afraid of her than if she'd been my uncle Oliver, and I'a little boy again tumbling down the hill-side in the Valley Farm."

He moved a little way from the balustrade, and stood looking rather sheepishly towards the group he had left, doubtful whether he was expected to rejoin them, or to stroll about by himself, amusing himself as he pleased. He would have given a great deal of money for the poorest treatise on social etiquette that could have been written in a single day. Lingering thus, doubtful of himself, and painfully conscious of being very much out of keeping with the place, he found himself in a confused jumble of all manner of incongruous things; and among other fancies one special thought which gault hold of his wandering consciousness with the events of the day, kept surging up towards the troubled sea of his reflections.

"I never saw her at my cousin Susan," he thought; "I know now that I never really loved my cousin Susan."

CHAPTER IX.—JULIA DESMOND MAKES HERSELF AGREEABLE.

CAPTAIN MASTERS drove Lionel Hilary's phaeton to the Cedars, and left the world a little more agreeable before the Chateau de Bourbon had dispersed, and only a few scattered groups still lingered about in the pleasant haze of early twilight. Amongst which loiterers might be observed some lively gentlemen of the occasional reporter species, who wanted to ascertain whether there would not be something in the champagne and lobster salad way before the fête was finished. Captain Masters drove his friend to Somerset House in the dusty, the mail phaeton, while Lionel Hilary and Francis Tredethlyn went home with the ladies in the landau.

The man who had been a private soldier only a few months before that day, and who had not yet been able to realise the altered position in which he found himself, was overwhelmed by a sense of humiliation. The feeling which oppressed him was rather a sense of unreality. He was like a child in a pantomime, who sees a magic wand for the first time, and cannot believe that the resplendent creature is only flesh and blood. He looked at Maude Hilary, and thought of her cousin Susan, in her cotton and brown hair, shaded by the familiar dimity sunbonnet. There were men in the world who might think that such a creature as Maude was Miss Hilary. He tried to imagine the sort of man who might lift his eyes to that divinity, and there was in his mind a vague picture of a middle-aged gentleman with yellow whiskers and a geranium in his button-hole. The aesthetic element in Mr. Tredethlyn's mind was as yet very imperfectly developed; and his idea of a lover befitting Maude Hilary leaned rather to the gaudy king's pattern order of mankind.

The Australian merchant sat with his head leaning back against the cushions of the carriage, and his eyes closed. His headache was, if any thing, worse, he confessed, in answer to Maude's anxious inquiries. He did not speak three times during the homeward drive, and his daughter rarely took her eyes from his face. She was very fond of him, and displayed her affection for him now as frankly as she had done when she had been a little girl in a white frock, sitting on his knee after dinner, and eating unwholesome fruits and confections out of his plate. She watched him now with a tender anxiety in her face, and seemed almost unconscious of the big soldierlike individual, with a bronzed countenance and close-cropped black hair.

But Francis Tredethlyn was not entirely neglected, for Miss Desmond appeared determined to atone for Maude's want of courtesy. She had heard the Cornishman's story from Mr. Somerset, who had heard it from a gentleman whom he described as "a fellow in the 11th Hussars," and the handsome Julia felt some interest in the hero of the narrative. An ignorant young man, a farmer's son, who has suddenly come into a fortune of thirty thousand a-year is not the sort of person to be met with every day. Julia remembered that dreary ruin, that tall stone jail on the hill beyond Limerick, which sounded so well when casually alluded to as Castle Desmond, but whose image chilled her as it rose, dismal and stony, before her mind's eye. She remembered the muddy roads, the murderous ruts, the broad acres of irredeemable bog, the long rank grass waving on the roofs of tumble-down stone cabins, the gaunt pigs, and gaunter peasantry, and a feeling that was not altogether ignoble kindled a sudden flush upon her handsome face. What could not be done for Castle Desmond and those ill-used peasantry by a chieftainess who should have thirty thousand a year at her command! She fancied herself a kind of fairy queen, beneath whose wand pleasant homesteads might arise on those desolate hills, and yellow cornfields spread a golden mantle over the valleys now so bare and empty.

Miss Desmond's lot in life was altogether exceptional, and the sentimental dreams which come to some young women had no lodgment in her brain. She looked her fate straight in the face, and was eager to make the best of any opportunity that might fall in her way. For the present she was very well off where she was, though the worship of the golden calf, as represented by Maude Hillary, was a perpetual abomination to her. But she was tolerably resigned to her present position at the Cedars. It was only in the future that her life looked dark and threatening. She must marry before Miss Hillary, that was essential, or else she must resign herself to the miserable position of a companion on sufferance—necessary to Maude, perhaps, but very disagreeable to Maude's husband.

Under these circumstances a chance visitor at the Cedars, with thirty thousand a year for his fortune, was not a person to be disdainfully entreated even by the daughter of all the Desmonds: so Julia was very kind to Francis Tredethlyn during that brief homeward drive, asked him all manner of questions respecting his sentiments upon things in general and the charity fête in particular, and flashed her handsome eyes and white teeth upon him until he was almost dazzled by their brightness. Miss Desmond had very dark eyes, eyes that seemed of a greenish hazel when you saw them in repose, but which looked almost black when they sparkled athwart a fringe of dusky lashes. She had dark eyes and very white teeth, and the distinguishing characteristic of her face was the contrast between the darkness of one and the white glitter of the other. Mr. Tredethlyn knew that the young lady was very handsome, and that there was some condescension involved in her friendly notice of him; but his eyes wandered away to Maude's fair face and earnest blue eyes, and there was a suspicion of irrelevance in some of his replies to Miss Desmond's animated questions. If he had been less absent-minded, he might have seen that young lady's white teeth close vengefully upon her lower lip as she turned from him after one of those doubtful answers.

The dinner at the Cedars went off very quietly. Mr. Hillary was silent but hospitable, or at least as much so as a man can be in these days of Russian dinners and vicarious hospitality. Francis had lodged at a comfortable hotel in the regions of Covent Garden since his return from Cornwall, and had in no way altered his simple habits of life, so he was not a little puzzled by the array of glasses by the side of his plate, the lumps of ice which an obsequious attendant dropped ever and anon into his Moselle, the mysterious compounds in silver dishes which he discovered suddenly at his elbow whenever he was most abstracted by the novelty of the scene about him, and the vision of Maude Hillary, sitting on the other side of the round table in a cloud of white and blue. The dishes at that wonderful feast seemed so many culinary conundrums to Mr. Tredethlyn, and I fear that he made some very obvious mistakes in the management of the spoons and forks perpetually thrust upon him by the stealthy-footed retainers. But the dinner was over at last, and Captain Masters opened the dining-room door for the departure of the ladies, while poor Francis could only sit blankly staring like a countryman at a play. Lionel Hillary did not linger long over his wine; he had some papers to look at in his study, he said, and excused himself on that ground, as well as on account of that obstinate headache of his. The young men seemed very glad to be released from the atmosphere of hothouse flowers and pine-apple, faintly mingled with that odor of the bygone dinner which will hang round the most elegant dining-room, ventilate it as you will. Was not Maude Hillary in the drawing-room, whence already might be heard the sparkling ripple of arpeggio passages upon the piano? The two young loungers followed Mr. Hillary out into the hall, and Francis went with them, uncomfortably conscious of disadvantages not to be outbalanced by the possession of half a million or so in all manner of seven-per-cent.-paying investments. The young soldier, blacking his master's boots, had been the easiest mannered of mankind; but Oliver Tredethlyn's heir felt terribly embarrassed in Maude Hillary's presence—only in her presence; he was not at all abashed by Miss Desmond's eyes and teeth, though all their contrastive brightness was brought to bear upon him. Maude was at the piano, and Julia was bending over a stand of engravings. It may be that she had not very long fallen into that graceful attitude. When the three young men entered the room she looked up, and Mr. Tredethlyn meeting her friendly glance, and being considerably at a loss what to do with himself, went over to her, and found a comfortable haven in a low easy chair near the couch on which she was sitting.

"Do you care much for Leech, Mr. Tredethlyn?" she asked, as she turned over the leaves of a portfolio reprinted from Punch.

The young man looked rather puzzled by this question.

"I don't care much for them," he answered, frankly. "I never had any but once, and that was in Van Diemen's Land, when I had the fever, fifteen of them on my temples, and that was no joke, you know, Miss Desmond."

He was quite at his ease with Julia, but he would not for the world have been so confidential to Maude Hillary. Miss Desmond laughed good-naturedly.

"I don't mean those horrible creatures that they put on one's temples," she exclaimed, "but Mr. John Leech, the caricaturist. You must have seen Punch, even in Van Diemen's Land."

"Oh, yes! my mas——superior officer used to get it from his mother every mail."

He took the portfolio from Miss Desmond and turned over the leaves; but he only stared absently at Mr. Leech's most brilliant performances, and his eyes wandered away every now and then to the piano, where Maude Hillary was skimming through the gems of a new opera and dallying with her two adorers, deliciously unconscious of their adoration. Had she not inhabited an atmosphere of universal admiration and affection ever since she had exhibited her pink cheeks and infantile ringlets in company with the seven shilling March peaches and five guinea pine-apples, after her father's pompous dinners, to be admired by ponderous old city magnates in the pauses of solemn discussions upon the rate of discount and the last grand crash on the Stock Exchange?

Julia Desmond, always observant—cursed perhaps with an especial faculty for penetrating all unpleasant secrets lying hidden under the many masks which society has invented for the convenience of mankind—Miss Desmond, I say, was not slow to perceive the Cornishman's pre-occupation, nor slow to credit Miss Hillary another item in that heavy account so long standing between them.

"Even this country boor, with a great fortune of his own, must pay his meed of homage to the millionaire's daughter," thought Julia. "Is there some magical power in the possession of money, which imparts a kind of fascination to the possessor?"

Colonel Desmond's daughter had felt some of the keenest stings of poverty, and it may be that she had grown to entertain an exaggerated estimation of that golden dross which is so paltry a thing when considered in a philosophical spirit. She looked at the young man sitting by her side, and as she looked a mystic golden halo seemed to arise about him and surround him, until he appeared almost like an old picture of a saint, painted upon a shadowless background of gold. Thirty thousand a-year! and he was young, handsome, manly, good-tempered-looking, or even something more than this; for there was a dash of nobility in his simple bearing which scarcely seemed to belong to the runaway son of a small farmer. The good old blood of the Tredethlyns, once squires and landowners of some degree, was not dishonored by the young man who had blacked Harcourt Lowther's boots in Van Diemen's Land. He was not a gentleman after the manner of the nineteenth century; he seemed rather like a stalwart soldier of the past, simple and daring, frank and generous. Julia, contemplating him always enframed in the golden halo, saw that, with the advantage of a clever woman's training, he might be made a very presentable creature, in spite of that private soldier story, which, after all, was spiced with a certain flavor of romance.

"People would say I married him for his money," thought Miss Desmond; "but then they would say that if I married a provincial banker with fifteen hundred a-year! Thirty thousand—thirty thousand a-year! And he is not a man who would act meanly in the matter of settlement, and he could buy the Irish estate for a mere song, and he might call himself Tredethlyn Desmond."

Maude Hillary's companion and friend had employed herself for a very long time in the consideration of one grand subject—her own destiny. For a long time she had estimated every creature who came in her way by one unvarying gauge. Had he, or had he not, any bearing on that supreme question? If the answer were in the negative, Miss Desmond wasted no further thought upon the useless creature. But if she saw in the shadowy distance some possible combination of circumstances in which the individual might become a thread, however slightly interwoven, in the fabric of her destiny, Julia expended her brightest smiles and sweetest words for his gratification.

It was in no way strange, therefore, that the young lady who had given a good deal of attention to hare-brained young ensigns and penniless young curates, with nothing better than remote expectations, should consider Mr. Tredethlyn worthy of her most serious deliberation. The present, however, was no time for thought, for were not the young man's eyes perpetually wandering towards the slender figure under the light of the moderator lamp? Miss Desmond felt there was no time to be lost. Already the rich man had made his election—already he had enrolled himself in the list of Maude Hillary's victims. Another woman, perceiving the state of affairs, might have resigned herself to the loss of this grand chance of winning a rich husband; but Julia's courage was not so easily dashed. It rose, rather, with the thought of contest. Had not her father been a grand old freebooter, boasting of kingly blood in his battered old body, and spilling it under the colors of every rebel army in modern Europe? The Desmond spirit rose in Julia's breast as she saw Francis Tredethlyn's wandering glances, half sheepish, half unconscious.

"I can set myself against her this time," she thought; "and the battle between us will be a fair one. This man cannot be a fortune-hunter. We meet on tolerably equal terms for once in a way, Miss Hillary, and let us see who will win."

Julia's dark eyes flashed their brightest as she looked across all the width of the room to the radiant-looking girl at the piano; and then she turned them suddenly upon Francis Tredethlyn, and began to talk to him. She began to talk to him, and, more than this, she made him listen to her. Miss Desmond was a brilliant talker. She possessed that wondrous faculty vulgarly called the gift of the gab—the power of talking about everything and anything, or even about nothing, for the matter of that—the power of enchaining a listener in spite of himself, holding him prisoner when he had rather be away, and yet not detaining him an altogether unwilling prisoner—the power of talking ignorantly, without seeming to be ignorant; speculating ideas and allusions at a venture, and never betraying the shallowness of their nature; assuming an interest in the most uninteresting subject, and never revealing the hollowness of the assumption—a power, in short, which, in its fascination, seems like a modern form of those classic philtres which Roman maidens were wont to administer to eligible bachelors in the days when Rome was young. It may be that Miss Desmond owed this faculty in some degree to her Hibernian ancestry, but no suspicion of their native accent vulgarised her discourse. Only a softer and richer depth in her low voice betrayed her Celtic origin.

Julia began to talk to Francis Tredethlyn, and, in spite of himself, he listened, and was fain to withdraw his gaze from the distant figure at the piano. She talked to him of a soldier's life, jumping recklessly at conclusions, and taking it for granted that he must needs possess some latent spark of military ardor which would blaze up into a flame under the fire of her enthusiasm. She talked to him of her father, and all those guerilla warfares in which he had won distinction. She talked of Don Carlos, and Abd-el-Kader, and Garibaldi, whose name had not then the glorious significance which it carries with it to-day. She talked to him like a young Joan of Arc or an embryo maid of Saragossa, and all that was brightest in Mr. Tredethlyn's nature kindled beneath her influence. Had Francis been a stockbroker, Miss Desmond would have discoursed to him of Lionel Rothschild, or Lafitte, or Mirès, and she would have glowed with just the same enthusiasm though her theme had been the Stock Exchange or the Bourse.

But in spite of himself Mr. Tredethlyn was pleased and interested. His boyish yearning for a military career had been very nearly trampled out of him during dreary years of marchings and counter-marchings, and sword exercise, and barrack tyranny, with never the glimpse of a battle-field, or so much as a brief skirmish with some chance enemy. But those fresh young feelings all came back to him when Julia discoursed in low, eloquent accents of her father's foreign experiences.

"Ah, that was something like a military career!" thought the young man. "It was such a life that I hoped to lead when I ran away from Landresdale, and I thought I should come back a general, with a cocked-hat and a great plume of feathers, as the gardener's son does in the play I saw once at Falmouth."

And then Francis Tredethlyn, being by nature candid as a schoolboy newly come home for his holidays, opened his heart to Miss Desmond, and told her a good deal about his life. That dark chamber of his memory in which Susan's image loomed through the sombre shadows he kept religiously sealed from every curious eye. But on all other subjects he was very communicative. He did not tell Julia that he had been Mr. Lowther's body-servant, for there was something in that estate of servitude which had never been entirely pleasant to him, gallantly as he had borne himself under its serious ordeals. He had known poverty, he told Miss Desmond, in all its worst bitterness, and had seen his mother and father die broken-hearted, borne down by a load of petty debt and difficulty, when the loan of a couple of hundred pounds would have saved them.

"I felt altogether desperate one night, Miss Desmond," he said, "when my poor mother was at her worst, and my father sitting in the kitchen as helpless as a child—almost daft, as they say in the north. I felt desperate somehow, and I went out of the house and ran all the way to Tredethlyn Grange, and asked my uncle Oliver to lend me the money. He laughed in my face, Miss Desmond, and told me he hadn't a five-pound note in the house, and I dare say he spoke the truth, for I think he'd have gone half crazy at the thought of a sovereign lying idle. I went back to the farm, and—my mother died the next day."

He stopped, and sat for some minutes looking at Mr. Hillary's Axminster carpet. Julia did not say anything. She was too perfect a tactician not to know that anything she could say must appear commonplace at such a moment. She only drew a long breath, a kind of fluttering sigh, expressive of the deepest sympathy.

"My mother died, Miss Desmond," the young man went on, "and my father was not slow to follow her. So, having no one in the world to care for except—except a cousin, who had been like a sister to me, I ran away to Falmouth, and enlisted in a foot regiment, thinking that I had but to pin a bunch of colors in my hat and march straight off to some field of battle. I left Cornwall, Miss Desmond, but I never forgot that night before my mother's death. I've tried to feel grateful to my uncle Oliver for leaving me this fortune, but I can't. I ought to feel grateful, I suppose, but I can't. The memory of that night sours me somehow. Money seems such paltry stuff after all, when you think that all the golden coin in this world can't bring back one human creature from the grave."

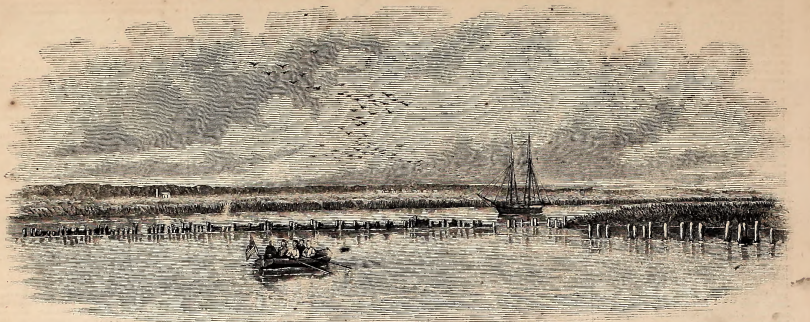
"Ah, yes, indeed," Miss Desmond murmured, in her tenderest voice.

And then, being blest with a very lively imagination, she found herself wondering whether, if wealth had been potent to restore the dead, and she had been possessed of wealth, she would have very much cared to awaken Patrick Macnamara Ryan O'Bryan Desmond from his quiet slumber in a little churchyard beside the winding Shannon. The old soldier of fortune was better in his grave perhaps, Julia thought, philosophically. She had begun to fight the battle of life on her own tactics, and had no very great opinion of her late father's strategy.

"He was very clever," she thought, with a tender remembrance of the Major's best manœuvres, "but then one so often saw through him. He always started with wrong premises, and fancied every one but himself was a fool, as if there could be any merit in deceiving only stupid people."

Miss Desmond was always wise enough to remember that the larger art of talking well comprehends the smaller art of listening gracefully. She was not one of those obnoxious people who talk for the sake of talking; and who, after rattling on without a full stop for half an hour at a stretch, will stare vacantly at you while you recite to them some interesting adventure, evidently thinking of what they mean to say next, and waiting for the chance of cutting in. Julia Desmond talked with a purpose—not because she wanted to talk, but because she wished to please—and now she listened to Francis Tredethlyn with an unfailing show of sympathy and interest that beguiled him on to tell her more and more. She wound and insinuated herself into his confidence as a beautiful serpentine creature winds itself into the heart of an apparently impenetrable forest; and before the evening was finished, Mr. Tredethlyn found himself almost as intimate with this splendid southern Irishwoman as if she had been his sister. She had set him completely at his ease, so that he no longer felt out of place in Mr. Hillary's gorgeous rooms; and when the merchant, coming into the drawing-room at eleven o'clock, very pale and worn-looking, asked him to dine at the Cedars on the following Sunday, Francis unhesitatingly accepted the invitation. He stole just one glance at Maude as he did so, but she was in the act of exhibiting one of the newest accomplishments of a mouse-colored Skye terrier for the edification of the two young loungers, and she was quite unconscious of that shy look from Mr. Tredethlyn's eyes. He went to her presently to wish her good-night, and the spell of her gracious presence dazed and bewildered him, to the cost of the mouse-colored terrier, upon whose silky paws he trampled in his embarrassment; and then, essaying to shake hands in a gentlemanly manner, he forgot what a stalwart giant he was, and squeezed the little hand that rested so lightly in his, until Maude's fingers were wounded by the hoops, and clusters, and hearts, and crescents of diamonds and opals which twinkled and flashed upon them—for Miss Hillary had seen the Marchioness of Londonderry's famous rings, and never wore any vulgar mixture of many-colored jewels upon her pretty white hands. Francis lingered a little after saying good-night, helpless under the spell of the enchantress, and then made his way somehow or other out of the room. Ah! surely uncle Oliver's money was not such sordid dross after all, when it was the golden key which admitted him to that paradise on the banks of the Thames.

GEN. SHERMAN'S CAPTURE OF SAVANNAH.



Batteries and Obstructions at the Mouth of the River.

WE exhibit from sketches taken on the spot by our Special Artist the fortifications and obstructions at the mouth of the Savannah. The obstructions, in both the north and south channels, were found to be of a very formidable character, consisting of heavy piles and deep cribs filled with large stones in close contiguity. Around these were placed innumerable torpedoes; these last have been taken up, at least from the south channel. A portion of the obstructions also, sufficient to admit the passage of our light draft vessels at half-tide and high water, were extracted and removed. When the channel is effectually cleared of these impediments, a cause of great embarrassment and annoyance will cease to exist. They are about a mile below Fort Jackson, and were exposed to the fire of heavy rebel guns on both sides of the river.

The sketches of Fort Jackson and Battery Lee were also taken directly on the spot by Mr. Crane, the Artist from our establishment, and sufficiently explain themselves. In one of them are indicated the 28th Pennsylvania Volunteers and 29th Ohio, of Gen. Geary's division, marching in and taken possession of Fort Jackson, while under fire of the retreating rebel ram Savannah, which was subsequently destroyed by the rebels. In the various batteries in this vicinity Gen. Geary's 2d division 20th army corps captured no less than 96 pieces of ordnance.

A STORY is told of an officer in the army, during the war of 1812-14, who was, and is still, more accustomed to the use of the sword than the pen. While stationed on the lake frontier, two of his soldiers, brothers, by the name of Kennedy, and usually called Kannada, had deserted. The officer wrote an order, and issued it to a subaltern, to take a file of men and proceed to a place named, and take the two Canadas. The order was peremptory, and not to be trifled with. The officer looked at his instructions and prepared to obey them, but he remarked that he did not believe he could take more than one of the provinces without a reinforcement!

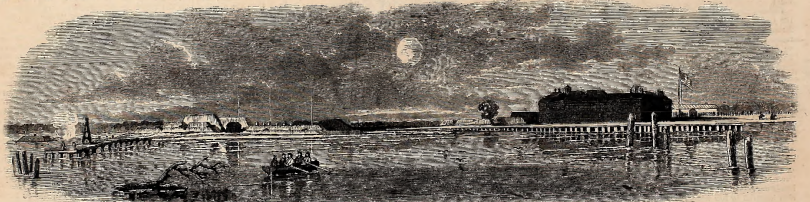
SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN IN GEORGIA.—From Sketches by our Special Artist, W. T. Crane.

REBEL OBSTRUCTIONS IN THE NORTH CHANNEL OF THE SAVANNAH RIVER, GA., A MILE BELOW FORT JACKSON.

THE CAPTURE OF FORT FISHER.

THE capture of Fort Fisher, one of the strongest fortresses on this continent, and, with the exception of Fortress Monroe, the most extensive, will ever be one of the most brilliant passages in the military history of the world, equalling, if not surpassing, the famous storming of the Malakoff by the French in the Crimean war, and that of Badajos by the British in the Peninsular. Indeed, in many respects it undoubtedly exceeds both those celebrated stormings, since it was done in a brief space, and with numbers which very little exceeded the strength of the garrison.

Among the singular circumstances connected with the event was the secrecy with which the second expedition was conducted. On the 13th of January the fleet commenced the bombardment. This was continued with unabated vigor throughout the next day; on the 15th it was resolved to take the place by storm. The strength and extent of this work the following description will demonstrate.



Fort Fisher.

Fort Fisher consists of one inclosed fort or bastion, from the opposite angles of which spread out, at right angles to each other, high parapets or curtains of earth-work, the sea face to a distance of 1,600 yards, and the north face about a third of this distance. At regular intervals these curtains are crossed by high traverses, which, at the same time, serve as bombproofs, and between which are mounted sometimes one, and at others two heavy guns. On the north face were 15 of these traverses, and when our men succeeded in capturing the first of these, the second was an earthwork, behind which the rebels could retreat, and so on successively, until our men reached the bastion, which was inclosed on all sides, and here the rebels would evidently huddle for their final struggle.

The Sailors Land.

The boats containing the naval force intended to cooperate effected a landing on a shelving piece of beach, about a mile and a half from the fort. They amounted to about 1,800, and were led by the Fleet-Captain Randolph Breese. Under him were Lieuts. Cushman, Parker and Selfridge. They were assisted by Cushing, Preston and Porter. The marines were commanded by Capt. Dowson, and to them was assigned the duty of firing at the rebel sharpshooters, while the sailors advanced on the run to board the sea face of the fort. The naval brigade advanced very carefully, for the rebels soon discovered them, and trained their guns upon them, both from Fort Fisher and the Mound, the Mound gunners having down their flagstaff to enable them to turn and train their guns on the advancing marines. To avoid losing men thus needlessly, a bat talion of sharpshoo ers was forward under the direction o Lieut. Samuel W. Preston. Lieut. Preston had shallow ditches dug, through which the men advanced, and were in a great measure protected from the rebel shell. As Lieut. Preston was walking from his diggers towards the main body, a fragment of an exploding shell struck him in the side, tearing its way through the abdomen, and then fell dead one of the most gallant and promising young officers in our navy. Still rapidly our sailors continued digging their way.

At two o'clock, and within about 800 yards of the fort Capt. Breese ordered the men to charge—the fire from the fort was terrific, and although our gallant man reached the fort they were compelled to retire, after experiencing considerable loss.

The Soldiers' Charge.

But the Naval Brigade had not fought in vain; while they were threatening the sea face of the fort and engaging the attention of the greater part of the rebel garrison, the 1st brigade of the 2d division of the 24th corps, headed by Gen. Curtis, scaled the north-east salient of the fort, and forced a rapid entrance, the rebs labering under the impression that the sailors and marines were the main assaulting column. The entire 2d division of the 24th corps forced its way into the fort. The assault of the sea face was now repulsed, and the rebels found a foe within their works. The garrison of the fort was a very strong one, and they were massed chiefly to drive back our soldiers. Our men fought desperately to gain ground.

Inch by inch they fought their way along the north-east face, the gallant 1st brigade in the entrance, the tall form of the brave Gen. Curtis, ever conspicuous, leading, encouraging, cheering on, his strong right arm clearing the way. Nobly he fought and well, till struck in the head by a rebel bullet he fell senseless and helpless. He was borne off by his devoted soldiers, and the fight waged fiercer than ever. Mound by mound the northern face was carried. Every traverse mound was a rallying and fighting point by the rebels. The enemy fought with the courage of desperation; our gallant men were animated by the good cause we maintained, for "thrice is he armed who has his quarrel just." It was a hand to hand struggle; bayonets were in general use, muskets were clubbed, and man stood up to man in deadly conflict. The guns of the Mound were trained on the north-east face of Fort Fisher after it had been carried by our men, and Gilsecre's division reopened fire on the Mound. The sun sank, twilight deepened, night fell, and yet the fierce struggle raged unremittingly within the fort. But the rebels were driven back, back from every mound and traverse, back into a corner, and gathered together for the final struggle.

The Final Struggle.

About 10 o'clock the final struggle took place, and after a short but desperate hand-to-hand encounter our gallant soldiers remained masters of the hitherto impregnable Fort Fisher.

Surrender of Fort Buchanan.

Gen. Whiting and Col. Lamb, the rebel commanders, had both been wounded in the early part of the fight, and had been carried into Fort Buchanan, upon which now Abbott's brigade was ordered to advance. Fort Buchanan is the strong rectangular earthwork fort a mile to the eastward of the Mound battery and a mile and a half from Fort Fisher. Here also some 700 or 800 of the garrison had retreated. Col. Abbott's forces moved up the Cape Fear shore, and on arriving before the fort found that two officers had been dispatched with a flag of truce to ob- the capitulation of Fort Buchanan, and soon afterwards they came in accompanied by Capt. Graves, of Gen. Terry's staff, and at 12 o'clock the fort was formally surrendered.

MR. JAMES COOKE, GYMNAST.

MR. COOKE, whose portrait appears in our current number, was born in Dublin, in 1836. He commenced his career as a high-grade performer in 1846, when only 10 years of age. Having great aptitude for comic humor, he directed his attention to professional jesting, and first appeared in public as a ring clown in connection with Pablo Fanque's celebrated circus, by whom he was engaged for six years, and speedily he became a great public favorite.

After exercising his comic powers professionally for several years in Europe, at the same time perfecting himself in gymnastics (he is perhaps the only man living who has thrown a quadruple somersault), he determined on visiting the United States, where he arrived on the 19th of May, 1863.

On the conclusion of a tour through the country he returned to New York, and conceived the design of the Hippotheatron—the first permanent circus ever erected in America, of which he remains one of the shining lights as courtly jester—in which capacity he stands long, being a master of repartee and the ability to seize on the incident of the moment and turn it to mirthful account. Never stooping to vulgarity, he relies on his native humor alone for the success he achieves, and he may be fairly regarded as the model clown and ter of his day.

JAMES COOKE, THE CELEBRATED SHAKESPEAREAN JESTER AT THE HIPPOTHEATRON, N. Y.

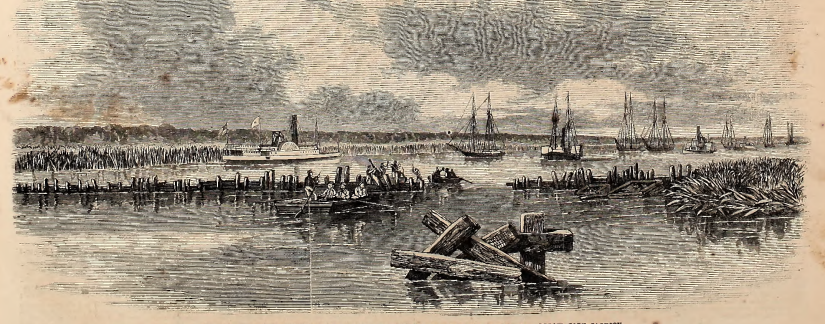
ADMIRAL D. D. PORTER.

THE gallant sailor, whose portrait we publish to-day, is the son of the famous Commodore David Porter, of the Essex, and was born in 1814. In 1829 he entered as midshipman, and passed in 1835. Under Commodore Tatnall he served with distinction in the Mexican War.

In 1849 he took command of one of the Pacific Mail Steamers, and remained in the service of that Company for several years.

In 1861 he was placed in command of the Powhatan, a steam sloop of 2,000 tons and 11 guns. He left that to take charge of the mortar expedition, and was present at the capture of the forts below New Orleans; after which he ascended the Mississippi, and assisted at the reduction of Vicksburg. Since then he has been operating on the Atlantic coast and the James river.

When the expedition against Wilmington was contemplated, Admiral Porter was appointed to the command, and how nobly he has fulfilled the expectations of the country our present illustrations will show.



MAJ.-GEN. ALFRED H. TERRY.

MAJ.-GEN. ALFRED H. TERRY was born in Hartford, Conn., Nov. 10th, 1827. He was educated in New Haven, where he was admitted to the bar in 1848. He became clerk of the county courts, but resigned in 1850, and made a short visit to Europe. He had long inclined to military studies, and took an active part in the militia of his State. He was Colonel of the 2d or New Haven county regiment when Fort Sumter was fired on, and immediately offered his services to the Governor, and was commissioned to command the 2d Connecticut regiment of three-months men, which was one of the few that behaved well at Bull run. He afterwards raised another regiment, the 7th Connecticut, which did excellent service in Gen. T. W. Sherman's (afterwards Gillmore's) command, at Hilton Head, and at the capture of Port Pulaski, for which it had the honor of being selected as the garrison. In March, 1862, Terry was promoted to be a Brigadier-General of volunteers, and for his subsequent services in Florida, Virginia and North Carolina, which we have no time to particularize, he was made a brevet Major-General. For the splendid service of capturing a fort which, 20 days before, Gen. Butler had declared impregnable, he deserves still higher honors, and, of course, he will receive them.

HOW LONG WILL THE SUN LAST?

ANOTHER essential question as regards the future of our planetary system has reference to its future temperature and illumination. As the internal heat of the earth has but little influence on the temperature of the surface, the heat of the sun is the only thing which essentially affects the question. The quantity of heat falling from the sun during a given time, upon a given portion of the earth's surface, may be measured, and from this it can be calculated how much heat in a given time is sent out from the entire sun. Such measurements have been made by the French physicist Pouillet, and it has been found that the sun gives out a quantity of heat per hour equal to which a layer of the densest coal, ten feet thick, would give out by its combustion; and hence, in a year, a quantity equal to the combustion of a layer of seventeen miles. If this heat were drawn uniformly from the entire mass of the sun, its temperature would only be diminished thereby one and one-third of a degree centigrade per year, assuming its capacity for heat to be equal to that of water. These results can give us an idea of the enormitude of the question, in relation to the surface and mass of the sun; but they cannot inform us whether the sun radiates heat as a glowing body, which since its formation has its heat accumulated within it, or whether a new generation of heat, by chemical processes, takes place at the sun's surface.

At all events, the law of the conservation of force

esches us that no process analogous to those known at the surface of the earth can supply for eternity an inexhaustible amount of heat and light to the sun. But the same law also teaches that the store of force at present existing, as heat, is not what may become heat, as sufficient for an inconceivable time. With regard to the stores of chemical force in the sun, we can form no conjecture, and the forms of heat lower existing can only be determined by very uncertain estimations. If, however, we adopt the very probable view, that the remarkably small density of the sun's body is caused by its high temperature, and may become greater in time, it may be calculated that if the diameter of the sun were diminished only the ten-thousandth part of its present length, by this set a sufficient quantity of heat would be generated to serve the total emission for 2,000 years. Such a small change, besides, it would be difficult to detect, even by the finest astronomical observations.

Indeed, from the commencement of the period during which we possess historic accounts, that is, for a period of about 4,000 years, the temperature of the earth has not sensibly diminished. From these old age we have certainly no thermometric observations, but the information regarding the distribution of certain cultivated plants, the vine, the olive tree, which are very sensible to changes of the mean annual temperature, and we find that these plants at the present moment have the same limits of distribution that they had in the times of Abraham and Homer, from which we may infer backwards the constancy of the climate.

Ohio has furnished 211,500 men to the army and navy, of whom 16,500 have died in service, and about 8,500 have been disabled.

HOSTETTER'S
CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this season of the year that the Stomach and Bowels are fortified with the purest tonics, under the name of medicine to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious when barreled to the rum of the dram-shop—and that the public should fully understand the fact. It is now known, that while all the distillers and rumsellers called liquors are impure, and all the Yeast containing alcohol or wood-alcohol, a secret poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these bitters, but are a combination of pure Jamaica spirits with the purest herbs in the most valuable medicinal, as fictitious and apocryphal herbs and plants, and with a safe and powerful tonic, by the aid of which, and its kindred compounds, the preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. He asks for this age equal to the combined sales of all the other Patent Medicines in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every profession, calling and walk of life. Dr. Talbott's Concentrated Medical is a PREVENTIVE of SICKNESS. The experience that Dr. Talbott has had during Twenty-five years' practice in this that it is the public had an article offered to it which would be of real benefit to mankind. Dr. Talbott's Medicated Pineapple Cider, designed for all classes, old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but is entirely new to the public. One quart bottle will last a family for a week, and will be found cheaper than doctoring; nevertheless it will save millions from being sick. It is a delightful beverage to endure a year in a free being sick, then to pay ten or twenty dollars in a doctor's bill, and many times more for the suffering and the inconvenience of being sick? To prevent sickness, use as follows: Take a wineglassful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the morning and evening, and the morning and the evening before you retire at night. It will become the strength and give vigor and healthy feeling in every person. A New York merchant, who has made a thorough trial of the Pineapple Cider, asserts that Talbott's Cider, one pint pounds of steak in one mouth at the first trial. He considers it worth one dollar per bottle for the steak alone. All orders should be addressed to

THE NATIONAL REVOLVER

Is the latest improvement in Fire-Arms, combining great power and effectiveness with compactness, durability, and convenience, both for operating and carrying.
PRONOUNCED by the press
Is loaded, without removing the cylinder, with CENTRAL FIRE CARTRIDGES, CONTAINING THEIR OWN CHARGE OF POWDER, and fires them as easily as a double-barrel gun. The cylinder never falls, fire as fast as you can pull the trigger, 10-inch ball, six shot and weighs but 2 inches extreme length. but 1½ pounds. For sale by the trade.
GEO. A. HICKOK, 84 Cliff Street, New York.

CERTIFICATE.

I have thoroughly tested the new "National Revolver," and find it an effective weapon, of sure fire and convenient size. At fifty yards I think I could with this pistol kill at every shot. I take pleasure in recommending it as a weapon in every way desirable. In company with Captain Scott, Provost Marshal, and other officers, I fired this pistol a large number of times, and did not carelessly fail to explode.

Testimonial from the most distinguished Artists to STEINWAY & SONS

New York, December, 1864.
The Pianofortes, grand, square and upright, manufactured by Messrs. Steinway & Sons have established for themselves so world-wide a reputation, that it is hardly possible for us to add anything to their just fame.
Having thoroughly tested and tried these instruments personally for years, both in public and private, it becomes our solemn duty to express our candid opinion regarding their unquestionable superiority over any other known to us.
Among the chief points of their uniform excellence are:
Greatest possible depth, richness and volume of tone, combined with a rare brilliancy, clearness and perfect evenness throughout the entire scale, and above all, a surprising duration of sound, the greatest sympathetic quality of touch ever change under the most delicate or powerful touch.
The peculiarity is found exclusively in the "Steinway Piano," and together with the matchless precision, elasticity of action and grouping of actions characterizing these instruments, as well as their unequalled durability under the severest trials, is truly surprising, and claims at once the admiration of every artist; we therefore consider
The "Steinway Piano," in all respects, the best instrument made in this country or Europe, and we them solely and exclusively ourselves in public and private, and recommend them as worthy to our friends and the public.
We have at different times expressed our opinion regarding the Pianos of various makers, but freely and unhesitatingly pronounce Messrs. Steinway & Sons' Pianos far superior to them all.

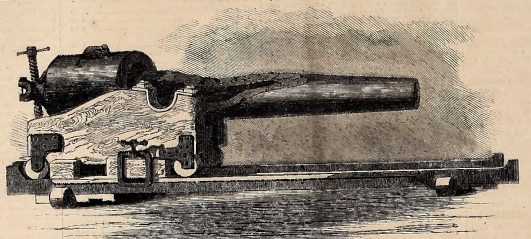
FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED

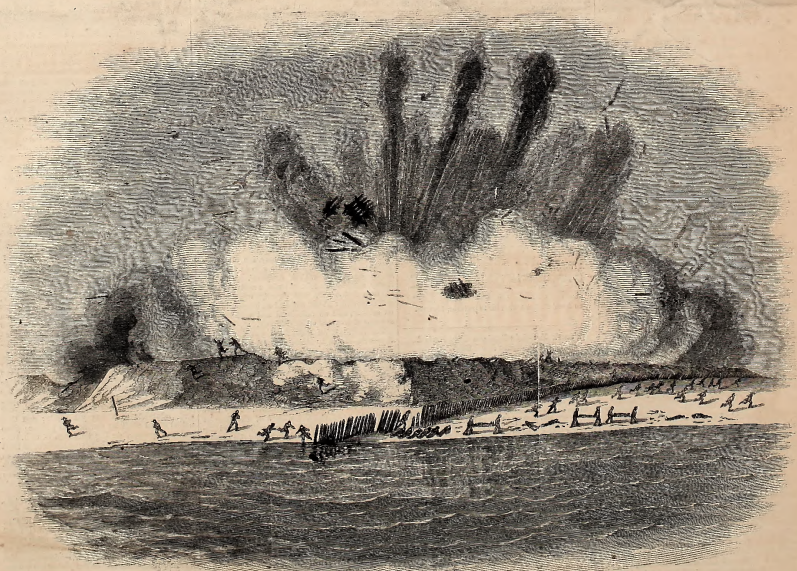


NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 480—Vol. XIX.] NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 11, 1865. [PRICE 10 CENTS, $4 00 YEARLY, 13 WEEKS $1 00

Re-establishment of the Republic of Santo Domingo.



SPAIN, after an inglorious struggle of three years, during which the whole power of the Peninsula was brought to bear upon a petty State of little over 200,000 souls, has been forced to abandon its pretensions in Santo Domingo, and to retire from a contest, which she wantonly provoked, in shame and confusion. It will be remembered that, immediately on the outbreak of our great civil war, when all Europe supposed that our power was completely broken, Spain hastened to reassert her authority over her ancient possessions, and, availing herself of the aid of a few traitors in Santo Domingo, declared the extinction of that little Republic, and its reannexation to the crown. The royal decree to that effect was dated May 19, 1861, and a pompous occupation of the territory was made, under the most mendacious pretensions that it was in consonance with the popular wish. The apparent ease with which the change was effected inflamed the imagination and excited the cupidity of every European cabinet, and the notion of a partition of the American continent among the "princes and powers" of the Old World took form and body. France, always jealous of the colonial greatness of England, and believing that her vast wealth was mainly derived from her dependencies, pounced eagerly on Mexico, in the expectation of obtaining there that India which she had sought for in vain in Africa, while elated Spain began to dream of again spreading her Vice-Royalties over South America.

PARROTT GUN ON THE U. S. S. SUSQUEHANNA, BURST DURING THE BOMBARDMENT OF FORT FISHER.—FROM A SKETCH BY ESSON LAYCOCK.

All these assumptions and hopes were based on the probable disruption and extinction of the American Union, and upon the supposed incapacity of the Hispano-American Republics to resist any assault on their independence. Four years of war have, however, only served to develop the power of the United States, and the struggle in Santo Domingo has shown the utter impotence of any European power to hold even the weakest of the American States in opposition to the will of its people. It is roughly computed that Spain has lost 40,000 men and forty millions of dollars in her cruel assault on the independance of Santo Domingo, and the last mail from Europe brings us the news that the Spanish Government has finally resolved to abandon the contest. This decision was reached at the cost of what was called a "cabinet crisis," and in opposition to the wishes of the crown—which, with true Bourbon obstinacy, would have continued the costly, bloody and futile struggle.

The NARVAEZ ministry, which has taken the responsibility of the present step, has had the wisdom to act on the advice of Hamlet to his wanton mother, and "affect a virtue" though it have it not. It has certainly covered its humiliating retreat with a rhetorical and very well affected show of reason and generosity. After setting forth how events have proved that the annexation of Santo Domingo was not, as had been represented, "the spontaneous and unanimous" act of the people, the Ministers declare that "it was a delusion to believe that the Dominican people, as a whole, or, in the great majority, desired, and, above all, demanded their annexation to Spain. That the struggle having become general, it does not now bear the character of a measure taken to subject a few discontented rebels, but of a war of conquest, completely foreign to the spirit of Spanish policy. That even by concentrating our efforts and sacrifices, in order to obtain a triumph, we should place ourselves in the sad position of holding the island entirely by military occupation, full of difficulties, and not exempt from dangerous complications; that even under the most favorable hypothesis that a portion of the population may show themselves devoted to us after victory, the governmental system that would have to be established in those dominions must either be little suitable to the usages and customs of the inhabitants, or very dissimilar to that of the other colonial provinces."

Hence they recommend a repeal of the decree of annexation, as a measure sanctioned by their own judgment, and meeting the approval of the Crown. We may, therefore, speedily expect the concurrence of the Cortes, and the restoration of heroic Santo Domingo to the ranks of the American Republics.

In this denouement we may read that of the equally wicked and absurd attempt to subvert the Republic in Mexico. It is utterly idle to represent that there is any concurrence of the Mexicans in the order of things at present partially imposed by French bayonets. No one is deceived by the falsehoods of the French press in this respect, and no one mistakes the echo raised by the miserable claque that Maximilian has taken out with him, for the voice of the Mexican people. The man who set up this gilded puppet knows how utterly baseless is his throne, and how soon it must topple over; and, if report speaks truly, he has made indecent haste to indemnify himself for his outlay, in the now obviously impracticable attempt to create a monarchy on this continent, by requiring his automaton to cede to him a portion of his mythical realm. It is alleged that the silver region of Sonora, the States of Durango, Chihuahua—in fact, that the whole northern part of Mexico has been made over to Louis Napoleon as an indemnity for debts pretended to be due from the old Republic and for expenses incurred in the establishment (?) of the so-called Empire. It is further said, that a late Senator of the United States from California, the mercenary Dr. Gwinn, whose principal use of his former high position was to levy a tax on legislation, is to administer the territory in behalf of the French Emperor. We are not inclined to put much confidence in these reports, not that they are not perfectly consonant with the policy and practice of the hero of Boulogne and Strasbourg, but because the scheme of building up a power in the deserts of northern Mexico to oppose the extension of the United States, or to act in any way as a counterpoise to it, is too preposterous to be entertained by any human being outside of a lunatic asylum. In a military sense the region referred to is indefensible. Its people can never be brought to a concurrence in the radical change which a French Government must impose. French emigrants never identify themselves with the soil to which adventure or interest may carry them, and neither assimilate others or are themselves assimilated. And, finally, it must be obvious that the United States, whatever may appear to be its present phlegm in matters of this kind, is pervaded with the purpose, and silently but firmly determined, to permit no extension of foreign power on this continent. Above all it can never tolerate any attempt to circumscribe or limit either its territory or influence, through concessions made by sceptreless monarchs, acting in the interests whether it be of a master or a confederate.

Summary of the War.

VIRGINIA.

The only event of the week in this department has been the raid of the rebel rams, as the Richmond press terms it—this we have illustrated and described in another part of our paper. With this exception there has been a perfect quiet in the armies before Richmond and Petersburg.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

A portion of Sherman's army has taken possession of some of the main points on the railroad between Savannah and Charleston, but it is not known where Gen. Sherman intends to strike. The rebel papers recommend the destruction of the powder mills and other Government works at Augusta. The unsatisfactory condition of the rebel forces has resulted in the Congress creating the office of Commander-in-Chief, which Davis has, in obedience to the unmistakable public sentiment, bestowed upon Gen. Lee.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Illustrated Almanac for 1865.

This annual contains a greater amount of useful and entertaining information than any publication of the kind ever issued. It is indeed the only Lady's Illustrated Almanac published. It is embellished with over 70 beautiful engravings, by the finest Artists of the day, executed in the highest style of art. It contains directions for the parlor, ball-room, boudoir, store-room, kitchen, garden, nursery and sick-room. In a word, it is the matron's vade mecum, as well as the young lady's companion, and it should be found in every household. In addition to general illustrations, it contains splendid portraits of Mrs. Lincoln and Mrs. McClellan, exquisitely engraved on steel, and a graphic Bathing-Scene at Long Branch, printed on fine paper. This complete Lady's Manual—which contains more reading matter than an octavo volume—costs only 50 cents. It will be sent, postage free, on receipt of the price, either in currency or postage stamps. PART of the Smithsonian Institution building in Washington was destroyed by fire on the night of the 25th of January. Were it not that the complete destruction of the building would have entailed greater loss in the way of collections, pictures, books and instruments than actually occurred, it might be a matter of regret that the entire building was not consumed. As it was, the valuable collection of philosophical instruments, presented by Professor Hare of Philadelphia, was lost, together with the cabinet and other relics of Smithson, the founder of the institution. The so-called "Stanley Gallery" of paintings of the Indians, designed to preserve their features and characteristics—a fine idea miserably carried out—was also burnt. The Library of Bishop Johns, of Virginia, and the Beaufort (S. C.) Library, deposited here for safe keeping, shared the same fate, besides a number of fine paintings, pieces of statuary, etc. These are great and irreparable losses. But, as we said at the outset, it is a matter of regret that the building was not entirely destroyed; a still greater matter of regret that it was ever built. It was designed and erected under the supervision of that brilliant architectural genius who will be remembered as the author of that atrocity in the way of a fountain in the Bowling Green Park, which we believe was indicted as a nuisance and an outrage on public taste, and summarily removed in consequence. Human ingenuity could not have devised a more incongruous structure than was the Smithsonian Institution, and there seems to have been an almost fiendish desire as well as ability on the part of the architect to render it the most inappropriate and inconvenient possible, for the purposes to which it was to be dedicated. Among other wonderful adaptations was the putting of a large oriel window, with stained glass, in the gable of the saloon set apart as the "picture gallery"—a pretty and characteristic device, by means of which a portrait, for instance, when hung on the walls, would present violet hair, a yellow nose and lips of brilliant blue, as if the face had been rudely pushed through an undried rainbow!

It is to be hoped that the damage to the building is so great as to render its entire demolition necessary, in which case we may see an appropriate and convenient structure rise in its place, which shall be, withal, fireproof. The late flimsy, rambling, incoherent pile, a sort of modern Cretan Labyrinth, was equally unsubstantial and defective, and has entailed an irreparable loss on science, and an additional and well-deserved amount of disgrace on its designer.

The Smithsonian Institution was founded by James Smithson, a natural son of the late Duke of Northumberland, who bequeathed a sum of upwards of $500,000 to the United States, for the purpose of creating "an institution for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men." How knowledge is to be "increased and diffused" has been a question which the Government wisely devolved on the Board of Regents. They have sought to carry out the wishes of the founder by encouraging original investigations and researches, publishing and distributing the results, by means of a free public library of scientific books, and by open lectures on scientific subjects. In all these respects the institution has been as successful, considering its relatively limited means and the wide demands made on it, as could be expected; and it is safe to say that its publications have added more to the sum of knowledge, since they were commenced, than those of any other society or institution whatever. A daily contemporary, noticing the accident to the building, takes occasion to reflect on the management of the institution for refusing to permit the prostitution of its lecture-room for partisan purposes—because, in fact, some anti-slavery propagandists were denied its use. Hence it is stigmatized as "Secesh" in its tendencies; an allegation equally unfounded and malicious. The Regents of the institution are the President and heads of departments, and four members of the House of Representatives and the Senate, elected by those bodies respectively. Its Secretary and Assistant-Secretary are men of eminence in science, whose duty it is to see that the institution shall not be made the convenience of strolling lecturers on politics or religion, or on any other subject or matter not strictly scientific. All public institutions are apt to get to be conservative, or, in common phrase, "old-fogyish," and it is not to be expected that the Smithsonian will reverse the rule. The time may, nevertheless, come, when it will so far unbend as to elect men under three score years as corresponding members. As the Spaniards say, "Ojala!"

AMONG the evidences of patriotism on the part of the people, there are none that have been more marked than the patience with which they have borne the many, we had almost said the constant, encroachments that have been made on individual and guaranteed rights during the years of war through which we have passed. Intelligent as patriotic, our citizens have felt the necessity of strengthening the Executive arm, even at the risk of abuses inseparable from the irresponsible exercise of power. They have cheerfully sacrificed their Anglo-Saxon jealousy of personal freedom to the exigencies of the times, and have said to those in authority, "Do as you please, but save the nation. We lay our lives, our fortunes, and our most cherished rights on the altar, a willing if a necessary sacrifice for our country's salvation." This noble abnegation has been often misunderstood by those in authority, and they have practised on the people's patience to the very limits of endurance. Were it not that there is an abiding faith, that, with the return of peace, the extraordinary powers with which the Government has been invested, or which it has assumed, would be retracted or quietly given up, there would be a manifestation of feeling, and a rebellion against the existing order of things, that would make every occupant of office, from the President downwards, tremble in his seat. Now that the late election has destroyed every organization in the interests of the rebellion that existed in the North, now that our armies in the field have driven their bayonets into the very heart of the insurrection, now that the integrity of the Union is assured, it becomes us to see that the things, without which even nationality loses its significance and value, are restored to us intact, and that the sacred heritages of our fathers come back to us in all their amplitude and purity. Assumption must not be allowed to take warrant from too long or too patient endurance.

The conviction is gaining ground, in fact it is universal, that the whole system of arrests and imprisonments, as practised by the heads of departments, must cease, or its exercise be greatly limited, on the ground that the occasion no longer calls for extraordinary measures. This conviction is fairly expressed in the late emphatic action of the House of Representatives, directing the Military Committee of that body, by a vote of 136 to 5, to inquire into the cases of persons in the military prisons of Washington, alleged to be confined there without just warrant, and held, without trial, beyond the time fixed by law, and in ignorance of the grounds of their detention. In the debate on the resolution directing this inquiry, it was stated, on the personal responsibility of members, that there are men who have been confined in these prisons for many months without a knowledge of the allegations, if any, against them, and to whose repeated petitions and demands for trial or discharge no response had been given. Should these allegations prove true, we hope the officers, high or low, on whose authority such outrages have been committed, will be held up unsparingly to public reprobation. Such acts can no longer be excused or palliated on the ground of public necessity.

IN another part of this issue we present a picture of the 150-pound Parrott gun burst, on board the Susquehanna, during the second bombardment of Fort Fisher. During the first bombardment nearly our entire loss in killed and wounded was occasioned by the bursting of the 100-pound Parrotts, no less than six of them having failed in this manner. A commission, we believe, has been formed to inquire into these casualties, and it is to be hoped that it will be able to detect their occasion and suggest a remedy. Gen. Gillmore, probably our most accomplished artillerist, tells us that we have no guns of large calibre which will endure "with certainty 800 or even 500 rounds." The siege of Charleston was not abandoned until after 23 of the Parrott 100 and 200-pounders had burst. The famous "Swamp Angel" battery, composed of one eight-inch rifle gun, exploded at the 36th fire, blowing out the entire breech at the rear of the vent, disheartening the men, and causing a suspension of the fire on the city. For purposes of offensive war, then, we must have rifled ordnance of greater power and endurance than any yet made; and that nation which shall be the first to produce guns "strong enough," in the language of Gen. Gillmore, "to sustain the repeated shock of at least 1,000 charges of powder, in as large quantities as can be burned with useful effect behind the projectile, and at any required elevation," must have a decided advantage over all others.

THE Richmond newspapers compare their city to a "gigantic frogpond." They tell us that the men croak, the women croak and the children croak. The negroes are also making a general stampede, in view of a possible conscription of the negroes for service in the army. Croaking on the part of the whites, and a tendency towards "taking themselves off" on the part of the blacks, have come to be "a nuisance." No doubt of it.

THERE is something of the old Puritan exaltation of expression and earnestness in the brief proclamation of Gov. Fletcher, of Missouri, in officially promulgating the ordinance for the abolition of slavery in that State, recently adopted by the Constitutional Convention. He says:

"Now, therefore, by authority of the supreme executive power vested in me by the constitution of Missouri, I, Thomas C. Fletcher, Governor of the State of Missouri, do proclaim that henceforth and for ever no person within the jurisdiction of this State shall be subject to any abridgment of liberty, except such as the law shall prescribe for the common good, or know any master but God."

"INTERVENTION," with which we were so constantly threatened, during the first year of the war, seems to have disappeared from the European vocabulary. We hear no more about "inefficient blockades.' But we would not, fo the world, connect this moderation of tone, in the British and French press, with the statistics of our army and navy. We prefer to ascribe it to a returning appreciation of justice and national decorum. The possibility of a quarrel with either of the two great nations here named seems, therefore, at an end. We certainly have no notion of interfering with them; and we can conceive of no advantage to them which could accrue from interference with us. It is, of course, to be presumed that Canada will not permit itself to be used any more as a base for rebel operations; and it is equally expected that Louis Napoleon will make all reasonable haste in getting out of Mexico. The monarchy in Mexico will probably come to an end before we shall be ready to clap an extinguisher on it; but it behoves all parties interested, and especially the "nephew of his uncle," to abandon the tottering fabric in time, so as not to feel themselves called on to prop it up at the cost of a collision with the United States. It is clear that the scheme of again placing this continent under European rule is impracticable. The attempt to carry it out has developed the very power necessary to defeat it; and the best and wisest thing that the parties to the hopeless enterprise can do is to withdraw from it as gracefully and as speedily as possible. At present we are ready to accept the disclaimer of any such purpose with well-affected credulity; but later—well, then it will be a question for Grant and Farragut.

TOWN GOSSIP.

OUR customary January thaw has been followed by even severer consequences than usual, for without the slightest warning we rushed from days of dreary, disagreeable drizzle to an extreme of cold which no living creature could consider endurable, unless it may have been the Polar bear down at Van Amburgh's.

Somebody once wrote—

"When north winds blow and hailstorms pour,
The chief of virtues is—to shut the door!"

The man who was delivered of that couplet deserves, in spite of its bad measure, to have a monument erected to his memory. Probably each person who has read the lines has felt that it touched his own particular case as closely as if it had been written for his especial benefit, for the fiendish carelessness that half the people who open the doors of one's sanctum show, in regard to shutting them, is a theme to which no human tongue could do justice.

Hard enough to attempt being brilliant when the ink is stagnant in the bottle, and poetry and wit are congealed in the brain; but, in addition to these woes, to have the door swing wide open and see the poor little idea there seemed a possibility of warming into life drift out upon the Arctic draught, is sufficient to reduce one to a state of hopeless imbecility in the flower of one's age.

Into the bargain, how is a man to write pleasant, chatty paragraphs when the world refuses to do anything extraordinary, and only the petty pleasures and vices that are as old as the flood thrust themselves forward in place of the startling events which ought constantly to happen?

The persistent lack of novelty in the theatrical and musical line is such hardheartedness towards those bound to chronicle the events of the hour, and forced to be amusing whether or no, that really it ought to be made punishable under a statute for ill-treatment of innocent animals.

Booth still at Winter Garden, charming all listeners with his rendition of the immortal's greatest character; the Williamses triumphant at Niblo's; Mrs. Wood cruelly absenting herself from public gaze, and making everybody absolutely hungry for the laugh which she and the imps of mischief that animate her alone can produce; a round of standard comedies at Wallack's; and so on through the list, which has been praised and criticised so often that human ingenuity and language must fail to twist the old story into a shape even approaching passable novelty.

Heller, it is true, has varied his diabolical programme occasionally, growing always more wonderful, and making one feel, while witnessing his performances, that it is highly probable the old gentleman himself may arise and grant one here the honor of a personal interview, which ought, by rights, to be reserved for another and a warmer sphere.

Owens has exchanged Solon Shingle in the full tide of its success for Paul Pry, and for a Paul so amusing that if it had been brought out first it would doubtless have rivalled Solon in popularity; but the truth is, when a man has made so decided a hit we are apt to grow fault-finding, and compare any later effort disparagingly with the one which first compelled our admiration.

We have at least the promise of an event in the theatrical world—the return of Mrs. Jean Davenport Lander to the stage. She will make her appearance at Niblo's on the 6th of February, in a play called "The Mésalliance," and a mingling of circumstances conspire to surround it with universal interest.

It is not only that the public will be delighted to welcome anew the gifted actress whose triumphs are yet fresh in every mind, but the ovation offered her will have a still higher basis—a tribute of respect to the woman who, for the past year, in the midst of the terrible grief which desolated her life and in which a nation mourned with her, has given money, energies and earnest and incessant labor among the sick and suffering at Port Royal.

Pleasant as may be the renewal of the old histrionic triumphs to the artiste, pleasanter far will be the tokens of sympathy and appreciation that are not to be flung aside like stage trappings at the fall of the curtain, but which the woman takes home with her to be a solace in hours of loneliness, and a ray of sunshine amid the arduous duties of the profession to which she again devotes herself.

The round of gaiety goes on with increased energy as Lent with its spiritual sackcloth and ashes threatens a speedy approach, and balls and parties are hurried more closely together for fear that something in the way of excitement should be missed.

"Happy are those whose genius lodges in their throats or settles in their heels" is so true of men and women in a professional sense that it might be a proverb—they shall attain to villas in Italian climes and palaces by the sea, and be idolized even to the utmost requirements of exacting human nature. It is equally true that those who excel in the vocal or saltatory arts in an amateur way shall be petted and caressed, and made much of by that portion of the world which we are accustomed to call by the delightfully vague and doubtful term "society."

Certainly this is a thing to be remembered by all who have the training of youthful intellects, and every mother with a daughter to "bring out" should recollect that the highest state of cultivation is indispensable when the larynx and toes are concerned, whatever may become of the mental or that seldom exhibited and still less believed in commodity, the soul, which even the bards of the latter half of the nineteenth century have given up, making their poetic ravings as thoroughly materialistic as the rest of the life which sweeps us on towards the gap over yonder.

This frightful cold must moderate enough soon to give a return of the sleighing which we enjoyed a few weeks since, of which, by the way, we have a spirited illustration in our paper.

The skating, of course, remains magnificent in our present Siberian state of climate, and every stage and car going Central Parkwards is crowded with young people, who act decidedly on the "beauty before age" maxim in the way of making themselves comfortable. The overflowing interiors of all these vehicles reminds one of Lamb's joke when seated in a crowded omnibus, and a woman put her head in, crying: "All full inside?" "I c-can't s-speak for the r-rest," returned the inveterate punster, "but that l-last bit of p-pudding at Gilman's did the b-business for me."

The Park ponds are crowded at all hours of the day and evening with merry parties, among which one shall find an array of youthful female beauty that is perfectly dazzling. Whether or not it be owing to the faith in exercise and thick shoes which has grown up of late years, certain it is that the reproach in regard to the unhealthy, fragile appearance of American women will speedily die out, for among the galaxy of young beauties which New York can boast now England itself could not produce more healthful, buoyant-looking specimens.

The sudden increase in the way of pretty and buxom girls is almost as much of a marvel as the influx of blondes since the rage for that peculiar style of loveliness came up. Where were all the blondes before that time? Did a family that possessed one keep her in retirement? and if so, what a state of mind the brunette sister must be in who is obliged to resign her position as the pet of the domestic circle.

The bare idea suggests scenes which Thackeray ought to be alive to depict. Imagine a chamber sketch between the dethroned and the new crowned queens. Good gracious! how lucky that the greater part of the curls and cataracts are so easily unpinned, so that the blonde could enter the arena already shorn of the golden locks which have unexpectedly proved such a treasure to herself and the hairdresser.

Talking of crowds, reminds one of a fair source of complaint, and that is in regard to the shameful way in which the ferryboats are overcrowded, and we may mention the Hoboken line in particular, where the boats go so crammed that even standing room is out of the question, the trip utter torture, and the getting on or off an undertaking so perilous that one needs to be a professional gymnast to attempt it with any sort of safety. Certainly some remedy could be devised, and we think the proprietors of the line would do well to heed this murmur from the united lamentations of the river-crossing public.

The mention of the ferries naturally gives one a mental trip to Brooklyn, which has been treated to "Pocahontas" by Mrs. Wood, whom we first reproached for deserting her proper sphere. The houses have been full to overflowing, and it is easy to fancy what a treat the Brooklynites had, for Davidge played Powhatan in that inimitable manner of his, which, like some few other excellent things, improves with every season, and would dissipate the most obstinate attack of blue devils that ever a nervous man had to contend against. If Davidge would only be as genial off the stage as he is jolly on it, he would soon be at the head of our comedians.

The draft creates great excitement in all circles, and the best way of settling that difficulty and ending our troubles generally seems to be found in a mission some funny man ascribes to Alexandre Dumas.

The Illustrious is to begin a novel in a Federal newspaper, which Mr. Lincoln will dispatch beyond the lines in unlimited quantities; just when the whole South is in a state of intense excitement, the journal will cease its visits. Of course great consternation must follow—a deputation will be sent to Lincoln—back will go the crushing answer, "Dumas can't write for slaveowners." Davis refuses to give up his rights—the army revolt—put him utterly aside, and the South comes back into the Union. Then Dumas will finish the feuilleton, restore peace, and the end will be a grand tableau of the Illustrious on the Washington Monument, draped in the American flag and receiving the homage of a grateful people.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—Although the lower House of the Kentucky Legislature has, on a test vote, declared against the anti-slavery constitutional amendment, the vote showed a gain of 12 members in its favor since last winter, and half a dozen more votes would secure a majority.

—— Boston is to have a new City Armory at the "South End."

—— The Pennsylvania Historical Society has 8,625 volumes in its library.

—— The Internal Revenue receipts in Cincinnati amount to an aggregate of $7,600,000 since 1862.

—— In Pennsylvania there are 13,000 public schools, with 16,000 teachers, and 700,000 pupils.

—— The Boston Public Library numbers 116,934 volumes and 31,800 pamphlets. Its accessions last year were 6,226 books, 2,939 pamphlets, 367 maps and charts, 887 separate papers, 29 engravings, and a lithographic stone containing designs relating to the life of Franklin.

—— The sum of $865,043 has been received at the marble quarries at Lee, Mass., for material for the extension of the Capitol at Washington.

—— Sorghum is now cultivated to a considerable extent in Orange county, N. Y. The best cultivated plots yielded about 300 gallons of syrup per acre, worth now $1 25 per gallon.

—— Gov. Smith, of Rhode Island, has officially announced that the quota of that little State has been filled by voluntary enlistments.

—— The Eastern mails close now at six instead of 15 minutes past that hour.

—— Intelligence has been received here that the cotton captured by Sherman's army in Savannah is being shipped to this port as fast as practicable. Four cargoes are now on the way, and the balance will be sent forward within a very short period.

Western.—The Senate has ratified treaties with the Shoshonie Indians, who bind themselves that all hostile acts against us shall cease. The boundaries of their countries as claimed and occupied by them are as follows: On the north by the middle of the Great Desert, on the west by the Steptue valley, on the south by the Green mountains, and on the east by the Great Salt Lake, Toullu and Rush valleys. The Indians agree to remove to their reservations whenever the President shall deem it expedient, and become herdsmen or agriculturists, the Government paying them certain annuities in money, provisions and goods. The Indians also agree that the Pacific railroad shall not be molested, that military posts, &c., may be constructed, gold and silver mines worked, and agricultural settlements formed and rancheros established wherever they may be required.

Southern.—The Charleston Mercury, in an article, compares Mr. Lincoln and Jeff Davis. After abusing the former, and calling him a buffoon, he praises the energy and singlemindedness with which he has prosecuted the war, concluding thus: "He has called around him, in counsel, the ablest and most earnest men of his country. Where he has lacked in individual ability, learning, experience or statesmanship, he has sought it, and has found it in the able men about him, whose assistance he unhesitatingly accepts, whose powers he applies to the advancement of the cause he has undertaken. In the Cabinet and in the field he has consistently and fearlessly pressed on the search for men who could advance his cause, and has as unhesitatingly cut off all those who clogged it with weakness, timidity, imbecility or failure. Force, energy, brains, earnestness, he has collected around him in every department. Blackguard and buffoon as he is, he has pursued his end with an energy as untiring as an Indian, and a singleness of purpose that might almost be called patriotic. If he were not an unscrupulous knave in his end, and a fanatic in his political views, he would undoubtedly command our respect as a ruler, so far as we are concerned. Abroad and at home he has exercised alike the same ceaseless energy and circumspection. We turn our eyes to Richmond, and the contrast is appalling, sickening to the heart."

—— In his late address before the Tennessee Convention Andy Johnson said: "If Mr. Lincoln and Jeff Davis were to unite their powers, they could not prevent the universal emancipation of the negro. It is like a huge avalanche, half on its course; its destiny is certain and irresistible."

—— The Richmond papers are beginning to cultivate a wedge to the return of the Southern States to the Union, by inveighing against the perfidious conduct of England in enticing them into a rebellion and then leaving them in the lurch. John Mitchel, the distinguished and heroic vitriol thrower, says, that "all along the C. S. A. has been fighting the battles of England, but now, should peace between the two sections be restored, the only consolation the South can receive will be to join the North in a war with that arch enemy of the human race, England." The N. Y. Herald takes the same view, so there is unanimity in the two presses.

—— The Savannah Republican says that the Theatre there and St. Andrews Hall are crowded every night. Private letters from officers confirm the previous report that the citizens are gradually throwing off their reserve and becoming more and more cordial.

—— A turkey was exposed for sale in the Petersburg market, on the 8th ult., at the small figure of $112. Several years ago this sum would have bought three or four fine hogs, two or three barrels of meal, a quarter or two of beef, a barrel of molasses, a quantity of coffee and sugar, with a large turkey added.

—— During the recent rebel occupation of Huntsville, Ala., Rev. Mr. Bannister prayed for the "President of the Confederate States," but has since refused to offer up any supplication in behalf of Mr. Lincoln. Col. Horney, of the 18th Michigan, who is now Provost-Marshal of Huntsville, sent for him and demanded an explanation of his conduct. He said that the canons of his church required him to pray for the President of the Confederate States. "Very well," said the Colonel, "the cannon of our army require you to pray for the President of the United States, and if you refuse to do it you will leave our lines." He has got 10 days to pack up.

Military.—There is to be an investigation into the surrender of Beverley, since the number of Union troops which surrendered amounted to more than the capturing force of rebels.

—— A deserter from Forrest's rebel cavalry, who had lately arrived at Paducah, says that what is left of Hood's army is in a wretched condition. All the Kentucky and Tennessee men deserted before they crossed the border into Mississippi. Hood is now in Corinth, endeavoring to reorganize his broken columns.

Personal.—The widow of Gen. Lander, formerly Miss Davenport, is about to resume her profession as an actress. Since the death of her gallant husband she has been at Port Royal, engaged in nursing the wounded soldiers.

—— Gen. Terry, whom Fort Fisher has made famous, has a sister who is a hospital nurse in the Department of the South, and is highly esteemed by all who have known her in that capacity. His cousin, Miss Rose Terry, is well known to the reading public as the author of many popular magazine stories and verses.

—— A family named Upright, in Rockford, Illinois, has furnished ten men for the army. Three of the number have died in the field.

—— Gen. Terry, who commanded the land forces at the taking of Fort Fisher, although a lawyer by education and profession, had devoted much time to the study of war. He went to Europe in 1858, visiting the defences of the Crimea, and spending much of his time either among the fortifications of Europe or in investigating the principles of military science. His tastes led him into that field, and before the rebellion he was a thoroughly read soldier, familiar with all the principles of the art of war.

—— Gen. J. E. Wool is busy in finishing his memoirs; he is in very feeble health. Dr. Eliphalet Nott, who has been president of Union College for 63 years, is also in a very precarious state.

—— Col. Julian Allen, the agent sent from Savannah to arrange for supplies to that half-destitute city, has returned there, after having dispatched three ships laden with good things to the repentant rebels.

—— Capt. Warlow, of the 1st Precinct Police, has been presented with a handsome watch, etc., by the merchants of that ward.

—— A number of the citizens of Philadelphia have purchased Gen. Grant a residence in that city. In his letter, acknowledging the gift, he says: "It is with feelings of gratitude and pride that I accept this substantial testimonial of the esteem of your loyal citizens; gratitude, because it is evidence of a deep-set determination on the part of a large number of citizens that this war shall go on until this Union is restored; pride, that my humble efforts in so great a cause should attract such a token from a city of strangers to me. I will not predict a day when we will have peace again, with the Union restored. But that that day will come is as sure as the rising of to-morrow's sun. I have never doubted this in the darkest days of this dark and terrible rebellion. Until this happy day of peace does come, my family will occupy and enjoy your magnificent present. But until then I do not expect nor desire to see much of the enjoyments of a home fireside." The house selected is a new one, No. 2009 Chestnut street, and it is now being furnished.

—— Gen. McClellan, accompanied by his wife and child, sailed in the China on the 25th of January. After a passing visit to England and France, he will proceed to Rome, where he will remain for some time. His wife's health is the cause.

—— Regarding the authorship of the famous Hulsemann letter, which has been attributed to Mr. Everett, the Boston Traveller says that, before his death, John Taylor, Mr. Webster's farm-steward, stated that he sat with Mr. Webster in his room at Franklin, N. H., from about eight o'clock one evening until half-past four next morning, while the great statesman was drafting the celebrated Hulsemann letter, part or most of which letter was read piecemeal to Mr. Taylor as it was composed.

—— Gen. Butler arrived in New York on his way to Lowell on the 26th Jan. While he remained he was visited by many of our leading citizens.

—— The New York Daily Times rebukes Admiral Porter for inserting in his naval report a threat against England and France, recommending all commanders to follow the example of Admiral Farragut's simple report of his brilliant victories.

Naval.—Admiral Porter has sent an official report of his proceedings since the fall of Fort Fisher. The results are:

Reeves point—Two ten-inch guns.
Above Smithville—Two ten-inch guns.
Smithville—Four ten-inch guns.
Fort Caswell—Ten ten-inch guns, two nine-inch, one Armstrong, and four thirty-twos (rifled), two thirty-twos (smooth), three eight-inch, one Parrott (twenty-pounder), three rifled field pieces, three guns buried. Twenty-nine guns.
Forts Campbell and Shaw—Six ten-inch, six thirty-twos (smooth), one thirty-two (rifled), one eight-inch, six field pieces, two mortars. Twenty-two guns.
Smith's island—Three ten-inch, six thirty-twos (smooth), two thirty-twos (rifled), four field pieces, and two mortars—seventeen guns. Reported at the end of Smith's island, six guns.
Total captured, eighty-three guns.

Accidents and Offences.—Mr. William Branch, a well-known stock broker of Wall street, was killed on the 23d of January, while standing in Broad street, New York, by a brick falling on his head.

—— The Smithsonian Institute at Washington was partially destroyed by fire on the 24th of January; all the pictures except five or six were burnt; the lecture-room and philosophical department were likewise destroyed—as were the archives. As the Government are the trustees it will have to be rebuilt at the national expense, should there have been no fire insurance on the property.

Art, Science and Literature.—The whole of Sir Edward Bulwer Lytten's works, in 110 volumes, translated into German, have been published in Stuttgart.

—— Among the London announcements we find "The History of the Present American War, from its Commencement to the Conclusion of the Campaign of 1863," by Lieut.-Col. Fletcher, of the Fusileer Guards.

—— The second series of "The Biglow Papers" has been republished in London. The Reader praises these poems highly, saying: "The old quaint humor sparkles in their utterances—the old shrewd wisdom is to be found in their New England colloquialisms—the old deep satire and quiet pathos lie hid beneath the wonted garb of motley which they wear as in the days gone by; but yet, somehow or other, we cannot avoid the conviction that times 'are out of joint.' Beneath Biglow's scepticism and Sawin's rampant rowdyism a sense of the greatness of the issues with which they have to deal peeps out unconsciously. Grim earnest is hard to reconcile with satire; and any one who reads these later 'Biglow Papers' feels that the author is in earnest—that the laughing sceptic has become a preacher."

—— The game of Croquet, which has become fashionable in England, within the last two or three years, has given rise to a Chancery suit in London. The case is Captain Mayne Reid vs. the Earl of Essex and Emily Faithful. The latter is a printer, who published a book called "The Rules of Croquet, revised and corrected, by an Old Hand," and the Earl of Essex, a gay young gentleman of 62, was generally accredited as the author. It appeared, however, that he paid some person to write or compile the book, which person bodily "conveyed" the whole of it from a work entitled "Croquet," of which Captain Reid is author. The Vice-Chancellor decided that Captain Reid is the author and proprietor of the book called "Croquet," that the other book was a plagiarism and infringement, that the Earl of Essex and Miss Faithful must pay $625 to Captain Reid by way of compensation, and also full costs of suit, and that all unsold copies of their book be delivered up to be destroyed.

—— Ticknor & Fields's forthcoming publications include "Alexander Hamilton and his Contemporaries; or, the Rise of the American Constitution," by C. J. Riethmüller.

—— Carleton will issue soon a handsomely illustrated edition of Drake's "Culprit Fay," a poem which offers unusual facilities for an imaginative artist.

—— Mr. Disturnell's "Blue Book" for 1865 is just published by the American News Company, 121 Nassau street. It contains lists of the officers of the Government, census returns, and a variety of political and statistical information. It is a convenient and useful publication.

Foreign.—A lady of Lyons, France, having been beaten by her husband, took the advantage when he was asleep of tying him securely to his bed, and then, when he could not move hand or foot, belabored him with a good thick stick. She then bade him good-bye, informing him that she was going to elope with another man. The husband has naturally sued for a divorce.

—— Dumas fils is about to marry a very rich and noble widow called Madame Naraschine. One paper says that she is actually related to the Emperor of Russia.

—— The Canadian Parliament is becoming at last alive to the importance of keeping on good terms with the United States, for in a recent debate the conduct of the Southern refugees in Canada was severely denounced, and a determination was expressed to stop the abuse of asylum, and a commission was appointed to inquire into the cause of the failure of justice in reference to the release of the St. Albans raiders and the misappropriation of the money restored them; also, to inquire into the conduct of Justice Coursol and the Chief of Police. Meantime the Government has suspended the judge.

—— The municipality of Florence have taken measures for extending the new capital of Italy. The walls which surround the present city will be demolished, and their site occupied with public walks or boulevards.

—— Seven Protestant places of worship were open in Paris on Christmas last. They were the English church, the Episcopal church, the Wesleyan church, the Congressional church, the church of Scotland, a second English church and the American chapel.

Chit-Chat.—A Paris paper says, in consequence of the scarcity of ratskins, the best French kid gloves will be very expensive this year.

—— The Philadelphia Enquirer doubts the truth of the story that Mr. Colfax is going to marry Mrs. Douglas, and gravely gives its reason "that they have not met for four years."

—— Enoch Arden has been brought out at the Arch Theatre, Philadelphia. The popularity of this pretty poem is not complimentary to the age, for there is no heroism in a man suffering his wife to live with another man, and then, with his dying breath, blast her reputation and happiness by revealing who he was to a village gossip.

—— The manner of advertising for a husband in Java is to place an empty flowerpot on the portico roof. This means, in that language, "Here is a young lady within who wishes to find a husband!"

—— Michelet, in his new book, called "Humanity," makes an appeal in favor of the brute creation, which, he says, has fallen like man. Among other strange things, he says: "This battle of good animals for man is an historical fact. * * Give the first place to the cow. * * She alone, during the long journey from Bactriana to India, kept the primitive people alive. * * We must not judge the ourang-outang by the animal with which we are familiar. No creature more than the baboon has been frightened, embittered and perverted by man's harshness."

—— The most fashionable ladies' head-dresses in Paris now are made of peacock's feathers, raven's wings and magpie's tails. A brutal French writer says the peacock represents her pride, the raven her discontent, and the magpie her volubility.

—— The pay of over 800 officers of the Commissary Bureau at Washington has been stopped, in consequence of their failure to render prompt and correct accounts.

—— The Home Journal says that "Mr. C. G. Rosenberg is an artist of no mean talent." Does it mean that what he writes has no meaning in it? If not, what does it mean?

—— Gibson, the sculptor, intends to leave "£20,000 to the British Royal Academy, on condition that three rooms shall be therein devoted exclusively to the exhibition of casts of his works." He certainly understands the art of posthumous advertising.

—— The divorce laws in Indiana have been altered; a year's residence is indispensable.

"THERE is no moon, but the night is clear—
Clear and cold, and the stars are few—
In the shadow of Death I am walking here:
In the shadow of Death, at twenty-two!

"A year ago, on a night like this—
One brief year!—from a maid I knew,
In the shadow of Love I asked a kiss:
In the shadow of Love she gave me two.

"Two; and a third, and another yet—
One more yet, and she whispered, 'Go!
On the hazard of strife my love I bet:
On the hazard of strife, for weal or woe!

"'My country first!' Oh, the peerless maid!
Not a poor bath this maid, I know!
'My country first,' in that kiss she said,
'My country first!' and she bade me go.

"Say you a drink? Good comrade, no!
Ah! the love of a maid like mine
Flushes the heart with a godlike glow:
Flushes the heart like Olympian wine!

"A cypher of gold, with a braid of hair,
Clasps my wrist, and, if I should fall,
This to my maid I pray you bear—
This to my maid, comrade—that is all!"

* * * * * * *

There is no moon, but the sky is fair—
The sky is fair, though the stars be few;
In the shadow of Death he is lying there;
In the shadow of Death, at twenty-two!

His pulse is still, and his wrist is bare.
Clasp of gold, with its sunny braid,
The slender wrist of a maid shall wear—
The slender wrist of his peerless maid!

The Fate of the Forrests.

PART I.

A GROUP of four, two ladies and two gentlemen, leaned or lounged together in the soft brilliance of mingled moonlight and lamplight, that filled the luxurious room. Through the open windows came balmy gusts of ocean air, up from below rose the murmurous plash of waves, breaking on a quiet shore, and frequent bursts of music lent another charm to place and hour. A pause in the gay conversation was broken by the younger lady's vivacious voice:

"Now if the day of witches and wizards, astrologers and fortune-tellers was not over, how I should enjoy looking into a magic mirror, having my horoscope cast, or hearing my fate read by a charming black-eyed gipsy."

"The age of enchantment is not yet past, as all who are permitted to enter this magic circle can testify; and one need not go far for 'a charming black-eyed gipsy' to decide one's destiny."

And with a half-serious, half-playful gesture the gentleman offered his hand to the fair-faced girl, who shook her head and answered, smilingly:

"No, I'll not tell your fortune, Captain Hay; and all your compliments cannot comfort me for the loss of the delightful diablerie I love to read about and long to experience. Modern gipsies are commonplace. I want a genuine Cagliostro, supernaturally elegant, gifted and mysterious. I wish the fable of his eternal youth were true, so that he might visit us, for where would he find a fitter company? You gentlemen are perfect sceptics, and I am a firm believer, while Ursula would inspire the dullest wizard, because she looks like one born to live a romance."

She did indeed. The beautiful woman, sitting where the light showered down upon her, till every charm seemed doubled. The freshest bloom of early womanhood glowed in a face both sweet and spirited, eloquent eyes above lustrous and large, the lips smiled as if blissful visions fed the fancy, and above the white forehead dark, abundant hair made a graceful crown for a head which bore itself with a certain gentle pride, as if the power of beauty, grace and intellect lent an unconscious queenliness to their possessor. In the personal atmosphere of strength, brilliancy and tenderness that surrounded her, an acute observer would detect the presence of a daring spirit, a rich nature, a deep heart; and, looking closer, might also discover, in the curves of that sensitive mouth, the depths of those thoughtful eyes, traces of some hidden care, some haunting memory, or, perhaps, only that vaguely melancholy prescience which often marks those fore-doomed to tragic lives. As her companions chatted this fleeting expression touched her face like a passing shadow, and the gentleman who had not yet spoken leaned nearer, as if eager to catch that evanescent gloom. She met his wistful glance with one of perfect serenity, saying, as an enchanting smile broke over her whole face:

"Yes, my life has been a romance thus far; may it have a happy ending. Evan, you were born in a land of charms and spells, can you not play the part of a Hindoo conjuror, and satisfy Kate's longing?"

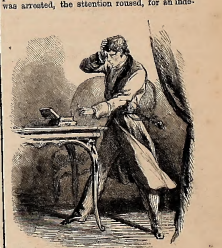
"I can only play the part of a Hindoo devotee, and exhaust myself with strivings after the unattainable, like this poor little fire-worshipper," replied the young man, watching, with suspicious interest, a moth circling round the globe of light above his head, as if he dared not look at the fair speaker, lest his traitorous eyes should say too much.

"You are both sadly unromantic and ungallant men not to make an effort in our favor," exclaimed the lively lady. "I am in just the mood for a ghostly tale, a scene of mystery, a startling revelation, and where shall I look for an obliging magician to gratify me?"

"Here!"

The voice, though scarcely lifted above a whisper, startled the group as much as if a spirit spoke, and all eyes were turned towards the window, where white drapories were swaying in the wind. No uncanny apparition appeared behind the tenthike spériuro, but the composed figure of a small, fragile-looking man, reclining in a lounging-chair. Nothing could have been more unimpressive at a first glance, but at a second the eye was arrested, the attention roused, for an indefinable influence held one captive against one's will. Beardless, thin lipped, sharply featured and colorless as ivory was the face. A few locks of blonde hair streaked the forehead, and underneath it shone the controlling feature of this singular countenance. The eyes, that should have been a steely blue to match the fair surroundings, were of the intensest black, varying in expression with a startling rapidity, unless mastered by an art stronger than nature; by turns stealthily soft, keenly piercing, fiercely fiery or utterly expressionless, these mysterious eyes both attracted and repelled, with a subtle magnetism which few wills could resist, and which gave to this otherwise insignificant man a weird charm, which native grace and the possession of rare accomplishments made alluring, even to those who understood the fateful laws of temperament and race.

Languidly leaning in his luxurious chair, while one pale hand gathered back the curtain from before him, the newcomer eyed the group with a swift glance, which in an instant had caught the meaning of each face and transferred it to the keeping of a memory which nothing could escape. Annoyance was the record set down against Ursula Forrest's name; mingled joy and shame against the other lady's; for, with the perfect breeding which was one of the male's chief attractions, he gave the precedence to women even in this rapid mental process. Aversion was emphatically marked against Evan Forrest's name, simple amusement fell to his companion's share. Captain Hay was the first to break the sudden silence which followed that one softly spoken word:



"Beg pardon, but upon my life I forgot you, Stahl. I thought you went half an hour ago, in your usual noiseless style, for who would dream of your choosing to lounge in the strong draught of a seabreeze?"

"It is I who should beg pardon for forgetting myself in such society, and indulging in the reveries that will come unbidden to such poor shadows as I."

The voice that answered, though low-toned, was singularly persuasive, and the words were uttered with an expression more engaging than a smile.

"GOOD-NIGHT, MY HUSBAND; SLEEP IN PEACE."

RECOVERY OF THE POISON.

"Magician, you bade me look to you. I take you at your word. I dare you to show your skill, and prove that yours is no empty boast," said Kate Heath, with evident satisfaction at the offer and interest in its maker.

Rising slowly, Felix Stahl advanced toward her, and, despite his want of stature and vigor, which are the smallest attributes of manhood, no one felt the lack of them, because an instantaneous impression of vitality and power was made on defiance of external seeming. With both hands loosely folded behind him, he paused before Miss Heath, saying, quietly:

"Which wish shall I grant? Will you permit me to read your palm? Shall I show you the image of your lover in yonder glass? Or shall I umpire in your car the most secret hope, fear or regret, which you cherish? Name me by choosing, and I will do one of these feats I will perform."

Kate stole a covert glance at the tall mirror, saw that it reflected no figure but that of the speaker, and with an irrepressible smile she snatched her eyes away, coldly, saying hastily:

"As the hardest task of the three, you shall tell me what I most ardently desire, if the rest will submit to a like test. Can you read their hearts as well as mine?"

His eye went slowly round the little circle, and from each face the smile faded, as that searching gaze captured it. Constrained by its fascination, more than by curiosity or inclination, each person bowed their acquiescence to Kate's decision, and as Stahl's eye came back to her, he answered briefly, like one well assured of his own power:

"I can read their hearts. Shall I begin with you?"

For a moment she fluttered like a bird caught in a fowler's net, then with an effort composed both self-control and aspect, and looked up fullproudly, half-pleadingly, into the colorless countenance that bent till the lips met her own ear. Only Kate saw, and the observers saw the unconscious blood flush scarlet to her forehead, burning hither and thither as eye after eye followed the direction of her own. Rising slowly, Stahl lifted his head aside from her, leaving a shame-stricken culprit where but an instant ago a bright, happyhearted woman sat.

Before Kate could reach her friend, or either gentleman exclaim, Stahl's uplifted hand imposed passive silence and obtained it, for strength of magnetism or presence always itself felt, filling the room with a supernatural atmosphere, which touched the commonplaces with mystery, and, while fantastic in form or theme like a spell. Without a look, a word for the weeping girl before him, he turned sharply round on Evan Forrest, startled by an impression that he should bend his tall head scarce, and when he did so, seemed to stab him with a breath. Pale with indignation and repulsion, he sprang back sprang erect, demanding in a smothered voice:

"Who will prevent me?"

"I will."

As the words left Stahl's lips, Evan stirred as if to take him by the throat, but that thin, resolute left hand and like a steel spring round his wrist and held the strong arm powerless, as, with a disdainful smile, and warning "Another word—now you are!" the other moved on undisturbed. Evan flung himself into a seat, vainly attempting self-control, while Stahl passed to Captain Hall, who sat regarding him with undisguised interest and amazement, which latter sentiment reached its climax as the magic whisper came:

"How dare you? who named did you know that?" he cried, staring like one surprised; then overturning his chair in his haste, he rushed out of the room with every mark of uncontrollable excitement and alarm.

"Dare you let me try my power on you, Miss Forrest?" asked Stahl, pausing at her side, with the first trace of emotion visible in his inscrutable face.

"I dare everything!" and she spoke, Ursula's proud head rose erect, Ursula's dauntless eyes looked full into his own.

"In truth you do dare everything," he murmured below his breath, with a glance of passionate admiration, as the cold ardor that made her seem wonderfully lovely for an instant flamed as suddenly into a flash of anger, for there was a perceptible change in the white features as his breath touched it in bending, and when he breathed a single word into her ear, his face wore the steadily frowning look of a soldier just ordered to some unsuspecting prey. Had she been actually confronted with the veritable heart, it could scarcely have required a swifter pause than she now gave. Fixed in the same half-shrinking, half-haughty attitude, she sat as if changed suddenly to stone. Her eyes, not yet dilated with unconquerable horror, never left his face while light, color, life itself seemed to ebb slowly from her own, leaving it as beautiful yet woful to look upon as some marble Medusa's countenance. So sudden, so entire was the change in that blooming face, that Kate forgot her own misery, and cried:

"Ursula, what is it?" while Evan, turning on the worker of the miracle, demanded hotly:

"What right have you so terribly women and insult men by looking in their ears secret information dishonorably obtained?"

Neither question received an answer, for Ursula and Stahl seemed unconscious of any presence but their own, as each silently regarded the other with a gaze full of mutual intelligence, yet opposing emotions of triumph and despair. At the sound of Evan's voice, a shudder shook Ursula from head to foot, but her eye never wavered, and the icy pallor of her features remained unchanged as she asked in a sharp, chill whisper—

"Is it true?"

"Behold the sign!" and with a gesture, too swift and unexpected for any but herself to see or understand the revelation made, Stahl bared his left arm, held it before her eyes, and dropped it in the drawing of a breath. Whatever Ursula saw confirmed her dread; she uttered neither cry nor exclamation, but wrung her hands together in dumb anguish, while her lips moved without uttering a sound.

Kate Heath's over-wrought nerves gave way, and weeping hysterically, she clung to Evan, imploring him to take her home. Instantly assuming his usual languid courtesy of men and manners, Stahl murmured regretful apologies, rang the bell for Miss Heath's carriage, and bringing her hat and mantle from the ante-room, implored the privilege of shawling her with a penitent devotion wonderfully touching, which did not prevent her shrinking from him and accepting no services but such as Evan half-unconsciously bestowed.

"You are coming with me? You promised mama to bring me safely back. Mr. Forrest, take me with you. Do not leave me alone."

She spoke tearfully, still agitated by the scene round inflicted by a whisper.

"Stay with poor Ursula, you, Kate; I cannot leave Ursula," began Evan, but a smooth, imperious voice took the word from his lips.

"If my guest, Miss Heath wish Ursula, and you, Forrest, will not desert Miss Heath in the distress which I have unhappily caused by granting her wish. Forgive me, and good-night."

As Stahl spoke, he blessed the hand that trembled in his own, with a glance that lingered long in poor Kate's memory, and left behind it a benediction. But Evan's dark face kindled with the passion he had vainly striven to suppress, and though he bowed his head in assent, it was evident defiance as he placed himself beside his cousin, saying doggedly:

"I shall leave Ursula to the tender mercies of a charitan unless she bids me go. Kate stay with us and lend your carriage to this gentleman, as his own is not yet ordered."

Drawing with the face of imperturbable composure, Stahl answered in his softest tones, bending an inquiring glance on Ursula:

"Many thanks, but I prefer to receive my dismissal from the mistress of the house, not from its would-be master. Miss Forrest, shall I leave you to forgive me for what I have done, or shall I remain to unfold certain matters which nearly concern yourself, and which, if neglected, may result in misfortune to you and yours?"

As if not only the words but the emphasis with which they were pronounced recalled some forgotten fact, woke some new fear, Ursula started from her reverie in surprise and mental suffering into sudden action. All that had passed while she sat dumb seemed to return to her, and a single glance she took to her appeared to decide her in the course she must pursue.

Rising she went to Kate, touched her wet cheek with lips that had not kissed it since a few companions regarded them with an eye that seemed to pierce to the heart's core of each. What she said there none knew, but some gift, some strong strength to steady and support her with a marvellous composure seemed born of that long scrutiny, for motioning her cousin from her she said:

"Go, Evan, I desire it."

"Go! and leave you with that man? I cannot, Ursula!"

"You must, you will, if I command, not wish to be alone with me. Evan, I implore, not even this magician, who in an instant has changed my life by a single word. See! I trust myself to his protection; I ask you to put his mercy, and implore you to have faith in me."

With an air of almost pathetic dignity, a penetrating appeal in her eyes, she looked at each in either man, and as each grasped the soft prize a defiant glance was exchanged between them, a glance that told plainly that each was determined upon the same end, though with widely varying aims for whom, like spirits of good and ill, they were henceforth to contend.

"I shall obey you, but may I come to-morrow?" Evan whispered, as he pressed the hand that in his own was tremulous and warm.

"Yes, come to me early, I shall need you then and ever."

And as the words left her lips that other hand in Felix Stahl's firm hold grew white and cold as if carved in marble.

With Kate still trembling on his arm, Evan left them; his last glance showing him his rival regarding his departure with an air of tranquil triumph, and Ursula, his proud, high-hearted cousin, sinking slowly on her knee before this man, who in a few hours was to have won the right to make or mar her happiness for ever.

How the night passed Evan Forrest never knew. He took Kate home, and then, with that lonely mountain and cliff like a restless ghost, thinking only of Ursula, remembering only that she had left him to meet her fate alone, he vainly sum mnit it rose upon a day that darkened all his life. As the city bells chimed seven from the steeples that surrounded it, Felix Stahl once more entered his cousin's door; but before he could pronounce her name the lady who for years had filled a queenly place in his household grief girl came hurrying to meet him, with every mark of sleepless agitation in her weary yet restless face and form.

"Thank heaven, you are come!" she ejaculated, flowing him aside into the ante-room. "Oh, Mr. Forrest, such a night! what have you said, or strange, so unaccountable, I am half distracted."

"Where is Ursula?" demanded Evan.

"In that room!" and her cry, as she has not uttered since that dreadful Mr. Stahl went away."

"Where was that?"

"Part midnight. At eleven I went down to give him a hint, but the door was fast, and for another hour the same steady sound of voices came up to me as had been going on since you left. When he did go at last it was so quietly I only knew it by the glimpse I caught of him gliding down the walk, and vanishing like a spirit in the shadow of the great gate."

"Then you went to Ursula?"

"I did, sir; I did, and found her sitting as I saw her when I left the room in the evening."

"What did she say? what did she do?"

"She said nothing, and she looked like death itself, so white, so cold, so still; not a sigh, a tear, a motion; and when I implored her to speak she only broke my heart with the look she gave me, as she whispered, 'Leave me in peace till Evan comes.'"

With one stride he stood before the closed door, but when he tapped no voice bade him enter, and when he opened it no one spoke. She was there, sitting as Mrs. Yorke described her, and looking more like a pale ghost than a living woman. Evan's eyes wandered round the room, hungry to discover some clue to the mystery, but nothing was changed. The lamp burned dimly in the place of early sunshine streaming through the room; the curtains were still wafted to and fro by balmy breeze; the vests still stood scattered here and there as they were quitted; Captain Hage's chair still lay overthrown; Kate's gloves had been trodden under foot, and round the deep chair in the window still glowed the scattered petals of the rose with which Felix Stahl had regaled himself while lying there.

"Ursula!"

No answer came to his low call, and drawing nearer, Evan whispered tenderly:

"My darling, speak to me! It breaks my heart to see you so, and have no power to help you."

Like one long dead, the weary relaxed in their strained gaze, the cold hands locked together in her lap loosened their painful pressure, and with a sigh that seemed to rend her from him, saying, like one wakened from a heavy dream:

"I am glad you are come; then self some fear from me, Evan," she whispered, standing erect.

"Evan! what did he whisper in your ear last night?"

Amazed at such a question, yet not ill pleased to answer it even then, for his full heart was yearning to unburden itself, the young man answered with eagerness, and the proud white hope, and his voice grew tender with the untold love that had long hovered on his lips:

"He said, 'Can you love me with your cousin's' but, Ursula, he lied, for I will win you even if he bring the powers of darkness to confound me. He read it in my eyes, for I must have read them long ago, and did not rebuke by one cold look, one forbidding word. Let me tell my love now; let me give you the shelter of my heart if you need it, and whatever grief or shame or fear has come to you let me help you hear it if I cannot share it."

She did not speak, till kneeling before her he said imploringly:

"Ursula, you bade me trust you; I do entirely. Can you not place a like confidence in me?"

"No, Evan."

Then if we do not love as I love," he cried, with a foreboding fear heavy at his heart.

"No, I do not love as you love." The answer came like a knell, and the whole frame trembled for an instant as if some captive emotion struggled for escape and an iron hand restrained it. Her round arms fell resting on Evan's hands, looked deep into her eyes, demanding, sternly:

"Do you love this man?"

"I shall marry him."

Evan stared aghast at the hard, white resolution that usurped every feature, as she looked straight before her with a blank yet steady gaze, seeming to see and own allegiance to a master invisible to him. A moment more and Ursula with a chase of conflicting passions, then fought his way to a brief calmness, intent on fathoming the mystery that had wrought such a sudden change in both their lives.

"Ursula, as the one living relative whom you have chosen, I have a right to question you. Answer me truly, I conjure you, and deal honestly with the heart that is entirely your own. I can forget myself, can put all my own love and longing, can devote my whole time, strength, life to your service, if you need me. Something has happened since last night that has changed you. No one whom event would move you so, for lovers do not woo in this strange fashion, nor betrothed brides put their happiness with such a face as you now wear."

"For women have such lovers as mine, or such as you describe, I do not believe, Evan, I have told you all I may; go now, and let me rest, if my rest remains for me."

"No, sir," she answered, with an indomitable a purpose in his face as that which seemed to have fixed and frozen hers. "I must know more of this man before I give you up. Who and what is he?"

"Study, question, watch and analyse him. You have my full permission, my full consent, and then I leave you free to do what you will, and claim an equal liberty for myself," she said.

Evan looked as if about to yield to you or to me and others. You must have known him elsewhere, Ursula."

"I have never seen or knew him till a month ago."

Evan struck his hands together with a gesture of despair, as he sprang up, saying:

"All I ask now, Ursula, is what Ago I left you, and in that little time you learned to love."

"Yes, in that little time I did learn to love."

Again the low, sad words seemed to fall like a leaden remove chook her, but she neither smiled, nor wept, nor turned her steady eye away from the questioning face that pleaded for her shelter and comfort.

Evan Forrest was no blind lover, and despite his own bitter loss he was keen-eyed enough to see that some emotion deeper than caprice, stronger than pity, sharper than regret, now held possession of his cousin's heart. He felt that some tie less tender than that which bound him to her bound her to this man, who exercised such power over her proud spirit and strong will. Bent on reading the riddle, he rapidly glanced through the happy past, so shared with Ursula that he believed no event in the life of either was unknown to the other; yet here was a secret lying dark between them, and only one little month of absence had sowed the seed that brought such a harvest of distress and pain. Stahl should be spoke:

"Ursula, has this man acquired power over you through any weakness of your own?"

A haughty flash kindled in her eyes, and for an instant her white face glowed with womanly humiliation at the doubt implied.

"I am as innocent of any wrong or shame, any weakness or error, as when I lay a baby in my mother's arms. Would to God I lay there now as tranquilly asleep as she!"

The voice broke from her with a fearless sob, and spreading her hands before her face he heard her murmur like a broken-hearted child:

"Oh, mamma! mamma!" and then she found me with a thought like that?"

"I will not I do not! Hear me, Ursula, and forgive me, if I cannot submit to you leave you for a man like this without one effort to fathom the inexplicable change I find in you. Only tell me that he is not master of you, that you love him and are happy, and I will be dumb. Can you do this to ease my heart and conscience, Ursula?"

"Yes, I can do more than that. Best tranquil, dearest Evan. I know what I do; I do it freely, and in time you will acknowledge that I did well in marrying Felix Stahl."

"You are betrothed to him?"

"I am; his kiss is on my cheek, the ring is on my hand, I am his affianced."

With a look and gesture which he never could forget she touched the cheek where one deep crimson flower bloomed as if handled there, and held up the hand whose only ornament beside its beauty was a slender ring formed of two twisted serpents, whose diamond eyes glittered with an uncanny resemblance of life.

"And you will marry him?" repeated Evan, finding the hard fact impossible to accept.

"I will."

"Soon, Ursula?"

"Very soon."

"You wish it so?"

"I wish what he wishes."

"You will go away with him?"

"To the end of the earth if he desires it."

"My God! is this witchcraft or infatuation?"

"Neither, it is respect, love, reliance, gratitude strong to dare and suffer all things for those who are dearer to her than her life."

Evan looked down on her face, for she had turned it from him, but in her voice trembled a fervor which could not be mistaken, and with a pang of unspeakable pain his heart acknowledged all hope, and bade farewell to love, believing that no mystery existed but that which is inexplicable, the working of a woman's heart.

"I am going, Ursula," he said; "you no longer have any need of me, and I must fight out my battle alone. Bless you, and remember, whatever befalls, while life lasts you have one unalterable friend and lover in me."

He left her still cold, still broken voice and face eloquent with love, regret and pity, Ursula rose suddenly and fell upon his bosom, clinging there with a passionate despair that deepened his ever growing wonder.

"God help you, Evan! love me, trust me, pity me, and I shall not be utterly lost. Only in that strange paroxysm of emotion, so tearless, breathless, trembling and wearied, yet still selfcontrolled, Evan Forrest understood all him to the door. No pause upon the threshold; as he lingered she put him from her, closed and bolted the door, and Evan Forrest, remembering that in her darkened life departed, she fell down upon the spot where he had stood, and lay there, breathless and still as one of some fair image of eternal sleep.

THE DOCTRINES OF SPONTANEOUS GENERATION, so far as the time of Redi (1668), were that living substances become converted during their decomposition into living matter, and that living matter lives them in the animal sense. This was opposed by Spallanzani, Needham, Bonnet and philosophic inductors. He stated that if the air be excluded no animalcules make their appearance, and consequently belief in spontaneous generation give way. As our readers know, it is now very much revived. In the last number of the Quarterly Journal of Science Mr. Samuelson has commented on Mr. Bastian's paper on the subject, which he sets forth fairly the present state of the controversy. Mr. Bastian and other spontaneous generationists have asserted that germs of living bodies do not exist in the atmosphere. Professor Pasteur, of the Normal School, in France; Dr. Jeffreys Wyman, of Boston, U. S.; Schaffhausen, of Zurich, and Mackenzie, in Belfast, and by those who maintain that the atmosphere is the cradle of living germs, have consequently held that Spallanzani, Needham, Bonnet, and Schultze, Schwann and Helmholtz were in error. Mr. Samuelson's paper is illustrated with engravings. He expresses his opinion that the question is not settled, and that "I am evidently a believer; and I have little doubt that the time is not far distant when we shall be very types, even known as protozoa, will be turned in their earliest stages to the animal-like forms, and that the latter, when placed in favorable circumstances, will develop the characteristics of their presence; for what is more natural than that along with the air, and in the rain and dew, the wind should waft about the light acospores of those minute forms of life which are known to be the habitat? And it is the solution strictly in accordance with scientific experience, that when these germs, or the germs accompanying the invisible through, the whole organic realm, we have the explanation of the origin of life and its propagation the more widely are their reproductive principles diffused in the inorganic."

PRINTING PAPER.—The consumption of paper in this country equals that of Great Britain and France together. In 1851 it was estimated that 300,000,000 were made here, valued at $25,000,000. About 462,000,000 of rags were used, at an average cost of four cents per pound. In New England, the Middle and Western States, the value of book, job and newspaper printing was returned by the last census (1860) as $39,458,883, of which $15,000,000 worth consisted of books, the value of the latter being nearly equal to the whole product of the same branch in 1850, which was returned at $11,250,000. The manufacture of paper has increased in an equal ratio, the state of Massachusetts alone producing paper of the value of $8,963,469, being over 22 per cent. of the product of the United States.

TO A MEMORY.

And art thou far, and art thou wide,
And ever wroth with me,
Though full of sorrow, day and night,
My life dwells all with thee.
I think I hear thy bosom heave
And see thy black eyes shine—
Oh! never—never, shall I find
Again a love like thine.

The world in roses blossomed round
While I was by thee yet,
And on the green and swelling ground
The laughing sunbeams met.
I kissed thee as I brake the rose,
And sang to that dear kiss—
Oh! never—never, shall I find
Again a love like this.

Free am I as the falcon now
That o'er the hilltop flies,
To whom the mighty world below
Sun-clear and open lies—
Yet hath the hawk a nest and home—
What home and nest are mine?
Oh! never—never, shall I find
Again a love like thine.

Oh! bitter day—Oh! bitter hour
That tore us twain apart;
The perished joy and peace no more
May warm this lonely heart—
In vain I search through land and sea,
As roams a restless wind—
Oh! never—never, love like thine
Again on earth I find.

TOM-TOM.

You buyee? Good! 'good! Eh!"

I was looking over the side of the brig, into a shore boat, manned by two Kroomen, hard samples of the boatmen along the coast. It was just off Porto Nuevas, on the west coast of Africa, and these men were only specimens of the hundreds that board every vessel that will give them even the shadow of a chance. They had nothing on board their boat but this one article of merchandise, which they were offering for sale so eagerly, and that was a chimpanzee. I was looking lazily over the side of the brig when they addressed me, with the thermometer at 137 degrees, and felt little inclination to enter into any bargaining, especially for a monkey, but just as the man spoke, and I cast my glance towards the miserable looking animal sitting in the stern, and curled up in a disconsolate way, it raised its eyes and met mine with a look so entirely human that I was instantly interested. It was the expression of a beseeching slave, soliciting some one whose face they had fancied to buy them.

"How much?"

"Dollar!" was the response of both the negroes, holding up one finger, and the chimpanzee became my property for the munificent sum of one Spanish dollar, and was transferred to the deck of the brig.

From the first moment of becoming a passenger on board the brig Maria, Tom-Tom—for so he was christened by the crew, though from whence the name was derived I could not discover—attached himself to me, not as a slave to a master, but as one gentleman would seek the society of another, for Tom-Tom was a gentleman every inch of him.

On first acquaintance I was disposed to treat Tom-Tom as I would have treated any pet, driving him away when I had become tired of playing with him, but I soon found out that I had much too grave a personage to deal with in this way. Tom-Tom was not often of a playful disposition, being rather given to study and meditation. He would sit sometimes for hours studying out some problem in seamanship, which he had not at first understood, but when he had once got the mystery through his head, be lent it his whole assistance, until finally Tom-Tom deserved to rate as a first-class seaman, for there never was a rope pulled that he was not doing his best upon the end of it, nor a bit of work done aloft that he was not a prominent worker. Many a time did he save a dangerous stretch by seizing some flying line, and bringing it to the hand from which it had slipped, and many a trip did he save aloft, sometimes on the darkest and stormiest nights, to perform actual seaman's duty.

I soon found out that Tom-Tom was totally uneducated when he came under my charge, though he had a mind that was continually grasping for knowledge. He lacked even the essentials of etiquette, though I found him much more ready to notice and accept instruction on that point than many who profess humanity and knowledge. I gave him a seat at table—for I always eat alone—from his arrival, and I had little reason, after the first week, to complain that Tom-Tom violated any of the rules of cleanliness or propriety. In the beginning he repudiated the knife and fork, and even for months would take the food from his plate with his left hand, and stick it upon the fork, before he conveyed it to his mouth, but I can truly assert that he never gave way to thrusting his fingers in the dishes, nor yet that extremely natural idea of snatching. He had his especial tastes, which he always managed to signify by a concentrated gaze upon that particular dish, and a lachrymose expression of countenance which could not be withstood.

One thing I will say for Tom-Tom, which is that during the six months in which I was intimately acquainted with him, he never once gave way to any butter-fingered carelessness, but that every piece of crockery or glass with which he was entrusted came from his hands unbroken and uninjured. Once I did think this character would be forfeited when I saw an antic of his performance. It was in this way. Tom-Tom had just got through dinner, and we were sitting over our wine, a little claret and water, of which I always gave him half a goblet when I took it myself, and of which he was extravagantly fond, sitting opposite and sipping it precisely as he saw me do. On this day we were running down near San Felipe, when the report came down to me that a norther was coming. These northers come with such sudden and fearful violence, that oftentimes there is not a chance even to get in sail, let alone secure the deck. I sprang suddenly out of the cabin, followed by Tom-Tom, who, as I saw at a glance, came on deck with his goblet of claret fast grasped in his left hand. In a moment all was confusion; men rushing every way, trying to secure whatever wanted lashing on deck, and aloft taking in sail. Tom-Tom was among them all, much more active than the quickest of them, but still grasping the goblet in his left hand. At one minute he was out with the men reefing topsails, at another flying around the deck, and finally when the hurricane broke upon us, he quartered himself on the lee side of a well secured water butt, and in the very worst howling of the storm, with his right hand grasping the lashings of the butt, he enjoyed his claret, and when the blow was over, returned the goblet, safe and sound, to the cabin table.

As I am determined that Tom-Tom shall have all the character he deserves, not only as a staid and quiet but as a moral chimpanzee, I must tell that, in spite of every temptation, he could not be led into bad habits. As a matter of course he was a great favorite among the men, and there was not one of them that would not have shared his ration with Tom-Tom, but would have given him the largest part of his scanty cup of grog if he had shown an appetite that way. But Tom-Tom was a gentleman, and would never drink anything but in the cabin, all the efforts of the sailors to lead him into taking a sip of their New England rum or a chew of tobacco having met with ignominious failure.

Like all great intellects, Tom-Tom was occasionally subject to eccentricities and bad powerful prejudices, which no time, persuasion or argument would remove. One of these eccentricities was that of following in my footsteps, speaking literally. Whenever I was on deck, either night or day, he was with me, and every step I took Tom-Tom was behind me, with the steadiness and gravity of a detective policeman. It was only when I stood still or seated myself that he could be induced to wander away, and then the instant my walk began, even though he was in the maintop, down he came by the run and took up his post.

Now for one of his prejudices, which was against the blacks. Whether it was that Tom-Tom's former masters, being of that color, had used him badly or not, I cannot say, as he never, even in confidence, communicated anything of it to me, but he would never make friendship with one of them on any temptation. Even further than this, Tom-Tom never missed the chance of doing the ebonies an ill turn. Many a time, when we were at anchor, and he would be swinging carelessly about the rigging, he would drop, with a lightning plunge, to the end of his line, and fasten upon the wool of some luckless wretch in one of the canoes alongside, and then, before the frightened negro could recover the hair-pulling, Tom-Tom was back, far out of reach. The rigging was his favorite lounge, and his method was this: It is customary, on the west African coast, to have the hammocks on deck and there swing away the greater part of the day. When Tom-Tom first came on board, he took it into his head that he must share my hammock, an idea I soon dispelled by driving him out, there being scarce room for one. At first he took this bitterly to heart, and then, as though considering the matter, he caught up a piece of loose ratline and transferred himself and it aloft. With this ratline, which was always after this respected as Tom-Tom's property, he constructed, during his career, not less than a hundred available hammocks and swings, in every part of the vessel, in each of which be seemed to enjoy himself in most enviable comfort.

Not to make myself tiresome in talking of Tom-Tom, I can only repeat that it has been my lot in life to meet with some thousands of humans who were far behind Tom-Tom in intellect, in inventive faculty, in expressive pantomime, and in all those qualities that go towards making the genial companion and the gentleman. For seven months we were daily and hourly associates, and I am certain that during that time he never for one instant trenched upon my sovereignty or made me feel that he was one too many.

I had been warned by my friends at the Cape of Good Hope that it was a dangerous experiment to attempt the bringing of Tom-Tom across the Atlantic to New York, but I could not reconcile it to myself to leave him behind. I had a conversation with him in the cabin, the day before I sailed, in which I did all the talking and he all the listening, and the result was that Tom-Tom agreed to take the chances on the voyage. I had a suit of clothes made for him from a blanket, which I put on as soon as we were off the coast, in cold weather, for it was the month of December, but it seemed as though the first chill blast struck through poor Tom-Tom. He moped and lost his liveliness, and though occasionally he would rally and admire himself before a looking-glass, in his white suit, trimmed with red, yet he refused to go on deck, and the day when the brig made Montauk light, off the eastern end of Long Island, Tom-Tom's spirit took flight, as I hope, to the happy land of chimpanzees, where there is no more unsuitable climate.

"He was nothing but a monkey," as one of the sailors said, with whom he had been friendly; "but, oh, such a monkey!" And that night, a clear, frosty one, between Christmas and New Year, when we consigned poor Tom-Tom to the blue waters, I am tolerably certain in saying that as much real sorrow went with him as does with many of our own kind.

TRIP TO THE OIL REGIONS.

The extraordinary developments of the internal resources of America within the past 15 years is a subject of wonder, not to ourselves alone but to the whole world. The gold mines, scattered over the whole of the Pacific slope, silver, lead, copper and other products of the earth, found in such abundance in this favored country, no longer excite surprise, for they are accustomed and recognised facts, which the millions of wealth that have poured in upon us fully attest; but our new and seemingly exhaustless mine of commercial prosperity, Petroleum oil, has not only excited the wonder of all, but it has attracted to its development millions upon millions of capital, and absorbs the attention of all who have means to invest.

The fever which exists on the subject of petroleum can hardly be called a new disease. It has been going on for several years. It was at first confined to a few, who, knowing the facts, secured certain interests, quietly developed them, and drew from them profits which, even now, seem to us, fabulous. At the first, these interests were absorbed by private companies of five or six individuals, who, securing good flowing wells, speedily found avenues for disposing of their almost invaluable commodity of trade. The sudden amassing of great fortunes in our various communities could not fail to attract attention to the source from whence this vast wealth was derived, and soon the oil lands of Pennsylvania became thronged by eager searchers after the rich and exhaustless treasure of the earth.

From every quarter of the country came the shrewd business man and the needy adventurer, but nature had enough and to spare for all; every hour the industry of man revealed some new mine of wealth, and the fortunate discoverers who had not the means to develop their treasures naturally sought out the great centre for sufficient means to do so.

To accomplish this great companies were formed, and what had hitherto been absorbed by individual monopolies was now thrown open for general investment, and the public, eager to share in the almost limitless profits which were certain to accrue to each successful enterprise, rushed eagerly to make the venture. So company after company was filled up, and each day new ones arose, based upon developments which every day brought forth in the various oil districts. The incomes derived from these full working companies exceed those derived from any other source of investment, and new companies are now in the field, based upon property which there is no reason to doubt will yield as magnificent returns as any which has yet been offered in the market.

There are croakers who point with doleful faces to the fact that some of the wells which originally flowed several hundreds of barrels per day are now reduced to one or two hundred. They cite this fact to prove that the supply of oil is giving out. They forget to state, however, that these wells, located on small property, have been tapped, by sinking other wells on the line, on adjacent property on either side, which striking the same vein, have drawn off a portion of the supply. To this misfortune many of the finest wells are liable, the owners not having been shrewd enough, or not having means sufficient to secure the nearest surrounding land. Companies such as the "New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore Consolidated Petroleum and Mining Company," and the "New York and Liverpool Company," which own plots of many acres together, in the best oil region, are, unquestionably, the safest to invest in, from the fact that when they strike a good flowing well, they can preserve it in its integrity by not boring or permitting to be bored another well within a distance likely to tap it.

The facts about the oil region are so curious, so interesting, and so valuable, that we shall recur to them again for the information of our readers. They are by far too voluminous to be disposed of in a single article.

Below we continue the graphic narrative of personal adventures in the heart of the petroleum regions of Pennsylvania.

On we toiled, past McClintock farm, through an evil-disposed snowstorm, hoping always that Oil City was near, and always disappointed as a matter of course. We felt it our duty to stop and inquire the distance of every man we met, and were able to judge of the state of mind the person was in, or the length of the journey before him by the sort of answer we received.

Just on the summit of a steep hill we saw a long, lank, cadaverous creature, who might have sat for a portrait of Don Quixote mounted on Rosinante, riding towards us at a furious rate. He drew rein when in speaking distance, and called out, in an agitated voice:

"I say, strangers, have you seen anything of a man on horseback, in a brown overcoat, with black kid gloves and fur on the top?"

We set down the carpet-bag and considered, debated, disputed, and finally were of the opinion that we had, somewhere on the route, seen a man who answered the description.

"That man is my brother!" cried the horseman, growing more excited. "I've chased him all the way from Meadville, and hain't overhauled him yet."

The wicked campaigner immediately remembered the lost brother distinctly, and described him so accurately that Don Quixote was bouncing up and down in his saddle like an India-rubber ball, when the campaigner ended by adding that we had seen the man he spoke of the day before, at Shaffer's.

Away spurred the Don, and on we trudged, feeling lighter at heart, as men always do after perpetrating a virtuous action.

A turn in the road brought us in sight of a little crowd gathered about a wagon, that had broken through the ice-crust into the sea of mud below, with both poor horses floundering and plunging, and sinking deeper with every struggle they made. Some of the men were trying to disentangle the poor beasts from the wagon, while one fellow, apparently the driver, was hopping up and down at a little distance, never lending the slightest assistance, with his whip sticking up under his arm, like a signal of distress.

"Is that your team?" we asked.

"Yes, —— 'em!" howled he, executing a war-dance that a Camanche would have delighted in, "they're mine; and I'm a waitin' fur a Chinyman to strike a bargain with, again they git through to his side!"

Farther along, in the desert, we saw a party out prospecting for oil, looking as wise as though their eyes were capable of discovering oil at once, however deep it might be embowled in the earth.

We were entering now upon what looked like a city of deserted derricks, but in the midst of the desolation, showing where so many companies had possessed a brief existence, we saw two or three works in full blast, belonging to the New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore Company. We stepped to visit one well, and in a thoughtless manner approached the tanks with our meerschaums between our teeth. The way the men shouted "Put out your pipes!" and the campaigner bounced up in the air were very funny things to hear and see. Capt. J. S. Clark, the President of the New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore Company, located in your city, afterwards warned us of the danger we had run in approaching so close to the tanks with our pipes lighted, the subtle gas which escapes being of the most inflammable character.

We stepped to warm at a little shanty drinking-house near by, where a group of open-mouthed listeners were gathered around a hairy, fur-capped man, with a long pipe in his mouth, and a general look of Robinson Crusoe about him. But when they told us he was an oil aristocrat, and counted the hours of each day by thousands—or counted thousands each hour—we looked at him with an involuntary respect, as the human embodiment of one's idea of the god of riches!

About the stove were gathered a group of oil aristocrats, holding earnest council, and vouchsafing no attention whatever to ordinary mortals from the height of their Olympus—not so much as standing-room near the fire, about which they were perched so luxuriously. In a corner of the room, tilted back in a chair, with his feet on the table, was the most singular specimen of an animal that I ever beheld, whether man or beast no one could decide; the face hidden in a slouched hat, a loose coat pulled over the ears, and my companion at once christened the thing "The What is It?" But I left the place without discovering what it was after all.

Everything showed that we were nearing the famous city—the roads grew worse—the travellers increased—we passed a party of oil pilgrims among whom was a man with a wooden leg—impromptu sleighs rigged in marvellous fashions and crowded with merry groups—and on we walked with renewed energy.

A turn in the road—we stopped to look at a barge loaded with oil and a skiff, breaking their way through the ice and apparently running a race, when behold! just below lay the goal of our journey, that bourne from which so many travellers return "sadder if not better men!"

We gave a shout—drank a libation to the gods in our last draught of Bourbon, and on we pushed towards the rocky entrance of the Aladdin city.

Just as the campaigner flung down the bottle upon the ice, a young woman in skirts short enough to have suited a ballet dancer, with a pair of boots an Esquimaux might have envied, swept past us as if borne on the wind—a fine specimen of an Oil City belle—out for exercise. She vouchsafed us one glance of scorn and swept on, leaving us to enter the town extremely crestfallen, the campaigner in particular wearing a generally drooping look, that made a delightful contrast to the buoyancy his face had worn just before that unlucky encounter.

THE INDIAN CORN OF PERU.

We last week gave an extract from the address of Mr. E. G. Squier, before the Farmers' Club of this city, referring to the Peruvian grain called Quinua. We now submit another extract on the Maize or Indian Corn of that country, with the single observation that the specimens presented by Mr. Squier excited equally the wonder and admiration of all who saw them.

Maize, or Indian Corn, is found everywhere in Peru, except in the high Punos, and presents itself in numerous varieties. I shall not enter into a discussion of the question whether it is indigenous in Peru, but am able to assert that it existed there at a very early period. I found it, in making excavations among the ruins of Pachacamac and elsewhere, buried with the dead in places where these were three layers deep, and where the walls of structures, ruined centuries ago, had been built over the forgotten graves.

On the coast, the maize flourishes very well, but ripens slowly, and is liable to mildew. The ears are generally short, but with a small cob, set round with more rows than ours. The ordinary variety is yellow, but there is also the white, and a stumpy variety of red and dark blue. The latter is most frequently found in the ancient graves, with the dessicated bodies of the dead.

In the Punos it will not grow at all, except in the immediate vicinity of Lake Titicaca, and on the islands in the lake. Here the stalk attains from two to two and a half feet in height, and the ear—which is seldom more than three inches long—starts from the ground close to the foot. The production is therefore very small, and the grain is almost wholly used for parching, for which purpose it is unsurpassed. The "parched corn" of the Puno would make the fortune of the old woman with the apple-stand on the corner, or the lame man who supplies the offices "down-town."

This maize, or rather that produced on the sacred islands of Lake Titicaca, and on the Peninsula of Copacabana, was dedicated to the Inca, and made into bread for him by the Virgins of the Sun. It was also used in the rites of the ancient religion.

But the maize par excellence of Peru is that produced in the deep valleys of the snowy Andes, through which the head waters of the Amazon have their course. These valleys are relatively warm, even at the latitude of from 9,000 to 11,000 feet above the sea. They are very narrow, often nothing more than gigantic chasms, where the rivers flow between almost precipitous walls of rock, but sometimes they widen out and give strips of interval land which the Incas widen by terracing up the sides of the adjacent mountains.

In these places the soil is usually rich, and is pressed up to its full measure of production by careful irrigation. The valley most famous for its maize is that of Yucay, or Urabamba, about 18 miles N. E. of Cuzco, the old Inca capital, through which flows the river Vilcanota, one of the principal sources of the Amazon. This, though small, is perhaps the finest and richest valley in Peru. It was here that the Incas had their royal gardens, their baths, in short, what might be called their country seat. These lands are all beautifully levelled, and nowhere in the world is there so fine and symmetrical a system of terraces, or so complete a system of irrigation.

Flanked by mountains of disintegrated limestone, the soil of the valley is wonderfully rich; and here is found the celebrated maize real, or royal maize of Yucay. The stalk of the maize is rather thick and stout, the leaves rather broad than long, and very fleshy. It grows no higher than good corn in New York and Pennsylvania.

The ear, as will be seen, is short but very thick, and the grain twice or three times as large as those of our largest varieties of maize. Five or six ears of nearly equal size on each stalk is a common product, and makes this maize probably the most productive in the world. The pellicle or skin of the grain is thin, and the interior farinaceous to an unequalled degree. The same varieties of color exist here as on the coast, viz.: white, yellow, dark red, and black or blue black. The black variety is sweetest, and hence is most sought for purposes of fermenting in making chicha. The white is merely boiled, the pellicle peeled off, and then eaten with pepper and salt or with sugar. I may mention that the maize in the Sierra of Peru is planted in rows, and not, as with us, in hills.

SUNBEAMS.

BY WILLIAM ADRIAN HUNTLEY.

A BABY sat on his mother's knee,
On the golden morn of a summer's day,
Clapping his tiny hands in glee,
As he watched the shifting sunbeams play.

A sunbeam glanced through the open door,
With its shimmering web of atoms fine,
And crept along on the sanded floor
In a glittering, glimmering, golden line.

The baby laughed in his wild delight,
And clutched at the quivering, golden band;
But the sunbeam fled from his eager sight,
And nought remained in his dimpled hand.

For a cloud had swept o'er the summer sky,
And gathered the beam to its bosom gray,
And wrapped, in a mantle of sombre dye,
The glory and pride of the summer's day.

Thus cheated sore in his eager quest,
With a puzzled look that was sad to see,
He laid his head on his mother's breast,
And gazed in the dear face wistfully.

The cloud swept by and the beam returned;
But the weary child was slumbering now,
And heeded it not, though it glowed and burned
Like a crown of flame on his baby brow.

And I thought: Ah, babe! thou art not alone
In thy bootless quest for a fleeting toy;
For we all are babes, little wiser grown,
In our chase for some idle and transient joy.

We are grasping at sunbeams, day by day,
And get but our toil for our weary pains,
For ever some cloudlet obscures the ray,
And nought in the sordid grasp remains.

But when the lures of our youth depart,
And our empty strivings are all forgot,
Then down in some nook of the peaceful heart
The sunbeam glows when we seek it not.

ONLY A CLOD.

CHAPTER X.—COLTONSLOUGH.

FRANCIS TREDETHLYN went back to his hotel in Covent Garden after that quiet dinner at the Cedars, and his mind was full of the new images suggested by that brief glimpse of a life that was strange to him. He had been very much interested by Miss Desmond, and he tried to believe that he preferred her to Maude Hillary. Had she not been kinder to him, more friendly and familiar? and was it not reasonable that he should like her the better of the two? He was naturally of a grateful disposition, disposed to think meanly of his own merits, and he attributed all Miss Desmond's kindness to the purest promptings of a benevolent disposition. The idea that the young lady had regarded him from a speculative point of view, that she had entertained any notion of possible marriage contracts and settlements, by which she might acquire the use of his thirty thousand per annum, never for a moment entered Mr. Tredethlyn's mind. He knew, in a general way, that he was admitted to Mr. Hillary's drawing-room because his money gave him a kind of right to such society as that of the merchant's household; but he never for a moment imagined that any one of these delightful and high-bred creatures could contemplate any contingency by which his money might become of service to them. Wealth and beauty, elegance and refinement, seemed to find their natural home at the Cedars. Miss Desmond of course was rich, like Miss Hillary.

Francis counted the days which must elapse before that delightful Sabbath to be spent by him at the Cedars. Only three days, and during those three days stern duty called him away from London. Had he not declared himself ready to go to the end of the world in search of his cousin Susan Tredethlyn? He felt ashamed even of that one wasted day on the banks of the Thames. He had left his hotel in the morning, intending to dispatch his city business with all possible speed, and start immediately afterwards for Coltonslough. He had found out all about Coltonslough by means of all manner of inquiries, for it seemed rather an out-of-the-way place, known to very few people as yet. Indeed, Coltonslough turned out to be a recently discovered watering-place on the Essex coast, a place whose shores were supposed to be washed by the salt waves of the ocean; but the waste of waters that rolled along the muddy shores of Coltonslough was only an ocean in its hobbledehoyhood, and savored too much of the Thames and Medway to be considered a full-grown sea.

To the traveller who has grown familiar with the centre of Africa, to that bold explorer who has spent lonely days and nights amidst those darksome forests in which the forgotten cities of America lie buried, to the prisoner newly released from solitary confinement in the great prison-house of New York, so pleasantly entitled the Tombs, to one of these a newly-discovered watering-place may not appear dull. He who has been used to hear no more familiar voice than the distant cry of the bittern, far away amongst the swampy wilderness, may endure Herne Bay and live. The criminal who has undergone a decade of solitary confinement in the Tombs may possibly survive a month at Southend; but to the ordinary mind there is a modern abomination of desolation lurking in the unfinished terraces of a budding watering-place, or in a watering-place which has put forth its tender blossoms in the way of bow-windowed receptacles for the concentrated bleakness of perpetual east winds, and has been blighted in the bud.

Coltonslough was very young; it was in the most infantine stage of watering-place existence. Speculative builders had bought half a dozen plots of swamp and mud, and had erected dismal rows of houses, which turned their backs upon one another, and started off at right angles from one another, in utter contempt for all uniformity. If the melancholy sojourner at Coltonslough was of an active turn of mind, he was apt to be tormented by a wild desire to pull down and rearrange those straggling terraces, between which stretched hideous deserts of waste ground, with here and there a lurking pitfall, whence gravel, or sand, or clay, or chalk had been dug by unknown persons, who seemed always digging something or other out of Coltonslough, whereby an appearance of volcanic disruption was imparted to a place whose chief merit had been its agreeable flatness.

It was very young. A few straggling excursionists came on the blazing summer Sundays, and prowled about the shore with countenances expressive of supreme disappointment and disgust. Half a dozen families of cockney children were wont to congregate by the dismal waters every summer, provided with baskets for the collection of shells—and there were no shells at Coltonslough—and further provided with wooden spades for the undermining of sand—and there was no sand at that baby watering-place. Families did certainly come, beguiled by representations of impossibly cheap provisions, though the place was in reality very expensive, for every tradesman was a monopolist on a small scale. Families came, but no family ever came a second time to Coltonslough, and it may be that in the wonderful scheme of the universe, this new-born watering-place was not without its special use; inasmuch as it made people contented with London. The inhabitant of Bermondsey, returning to that locality after a sojourn at Coltonslough, found beauties in some dismal street which until that hour had appeared to his prosaic mind a street, and nothing more. The denizen of Ratcliff Highway sat down amongst his household gods, well pleased with a neighborhood which, although not unobjectionable, was a paradise as compared with Coltonslough.

It was to this place of desolation that a newly finished offshoot of the railway then known as the Eastern Counties conveyed Francis Tredethlyn. He went to look for his cousin, with no better clue to help him in his search than that one word, "Coltonslough," copied from the postmark of Susan's letter.

"But I won't be baffled," the young man thought, as he sat in the railway carriage thinking of the task that lay before him; "Coltonslough may be a big place, but I'll question every living creature in it before I'll give up the chance of finding out something about my cousin."

Luckily for Mr. Tredethlyn's chances, Coltonslough was a very small place, and after walking backwards and forwards for some quarter of an hour before the emporium of the one butcher, the solitary baker, who dabbled a little in the fruit and confectionery line, and the single grocer—who was also a linendraper, and beyond that a stationer, who had a side of bacon hanging on one side of his door, and a piece of showy cotton stuff upon the other, and who, moreover, was sole master of the Coltonslough post-office—Francis determined upon his plan of action. He had thought of his cousin very constantly in the few days before his visit to Mr. Hillary's mansion; he had thought of her a great deal since then, though he had not found it quite so easy to concentrate his ideas, by reason of a certain bright face and slender figure, all in a flutter of white and blue, that would sometimes intrude themselves upon his meditations.

Francis knew that his uncle's daughter had left Tredethlyn Grange with only a few sovereigns in her pocket, perhaps not much more than enough to defray her journey to London. Without money, without friends, she had fled from her home, and had not perished; but had lived to write to her father from this dismal watering-place of Coltonslough, some years after her flight. It was clear, therefore, that in the interim she must have either been supported by the benevolence of strangers, or she must have earned her own living. The last hypothesis was the more likely to be correct. Susan Tredethlyn had been educated to habits of industry, and had no doubt confronted the battle of life as fearlessly as any Tredethlyn should confront any battle.

"Poor little girl! she went out as a servant, I dare say," thought the young man. "She drudged and slaved for some hard mistress, perhaps, while her father was adding every day to the money that has come to me—to me—and he refused me a couple of hundred pounds the night my mother was dying."

Mr. Tredethlyn went in at the grocer's doorway. There was scarcely room enough for him to pass between the bacon and the cotton stuff, which some aboriginal of Coltonslough would some day transform into wearing apparel. The postmaster was chopping some very sallow-hued lump sugar in the dusky inner regions of the shop; but he left off chopping, and advanced to meet the stranger.

Francis Tredethlyn was no diplomatist. He was quite unskilled in that peculiar science known as beating about the bush, so he began to make inquiries respecting his cousin with as little preface as he would have employed had he been asking for a pound of sugar.

"I'm a stranger in this place," he said, "and I want to ask a few questions; and I fancy as you're postmaster, you must be about the likeliest person to answer them."

The grocer rubbed his hands and smirked, in a manner that was expressive of a general desire to do anything obliging—of course with an eye to ultimate profit.

"A young woman—a relation of mine—left her home four years ago this month. For three years no one belonging to her could discover where she was. At the end of that time a letter was received from her, bearing the postmark of this place. I want to find out whether she is still here; or, if not, when she left. I have only just come back from Van Diemen's Land, to find things changed in the place that was once my home. So I'm groping in the dark, you see, and shall be very thankful to any one that'll lend me a helping hand."

Something in the frankness of his manner, the earnestness of his face, went straight home to the heart of the Coltonslough postmaster, who became less a tradesman, and more a man.

"It is rather puzzling, you see, in the way you put it," he said, scratching his nose meditatively. "You want a young woman who wrote a letter—or, leastways, had a letter posted at this place. But, lor bless you, not being under Government y'rself, you see, you have no notion of the dodges they're up to when they want to throw any one off the scent like with a postmark. You mustn't fancy a person's in this place or in that place, because you happen to get a letter from them with such and such a postmark. Why, I dessay I could get a letter posted from Jericho to-morrow morning, if I only gave my mind to it. What might be the name of the young woman as you are anxious to find?"

"Her name is Tredethlyn," Francis answered, hopelessly; "but as she ran away from home, and most likely wanted to hide herself from her relations, she may have changed her name."

The postmaster mused for a few moments, and then shook his head gravely.

"I never heard of no Tredevillings in Coltonslough," he said. "The young person was independent in her circumstances, I suppose?"

"Oh no, indeed! she had very little money when she left home. She must have worked for her living. I should think it likely she went out as a servant, for she was a country-bred girl, and had been used to a hard life, though her father was a very rich man."

A very rich man! That part of the business sounded interesting, and the grocer pricked up his ears.

"A country-bred young person," he repeated, "by the name of Tredevillane. And what might be the date of the letter with the Coltonslough postmark?"

Francis did not know the exact date. He could only inform the postmaster that the letter must have reached Cornwall about eighteen months, or it might be rather less than eighteen months, before the present time.

"Cornwall!" cried the postmaster; "then the country-bred young woman was a Cornwall young woman?"

"Yes; my cousin, Susan Tredethlyn, was a Cornish woman."

"A Cornish woman, and by the name of Susan! Why, if you'd put the date of the letter a good three years back, instead of a year and a half, I should have been able to lay my hand upon y'r cousin, there and then, in a manner of speaking."

"How so?"

"Because I did know a young person that lived with Mrs. Burfield in Trafalgar Terrace. But that young person left Coltonslough full three years ago, and I've never set eyes on her since."

"But tell me all you know about her!" exclaimed Francis, almost breathless in his eagerness. "What was she like? Why do you fancy that she was the girl I am looking for?"

"Because, in the first place, she was Cornish. I'd noticed that her talk was different, somehow, from that of the folks about here—though she was as soft spoken as any lady bred and born; but one day she was standing in my shop, with the children as she had care of, taking shelter from a storm, and a regular pelter it was too, and she stood looking out to sea through yonder half-glass door, which it were shut for the time being, and I made some remark about the unpleasantness of the weather, out of politeness like—for the young woman came very often to my shop for groceries and with lodgers' letters—Mrs. Burfield takes lodgers, and so forth—but she looked at me in a kind of absent way, and said, 'Oh, I like it! I like it!' 'You like the storm, miss?' I exclaimed, and then she answered all of a sudden, 'Yes, I like to see it. This place doesn't seem so strange to me to-day as it generally does. I've seen just such a storm as this from the moor on which my father's house stands, and I could almost fancy I was at home in Cornwall.'"

"And that's how you found out she was a Cornish woman. I think you've about hit it, Mr. Sanders. I think the girl who talked to you about the storm must have been my cousin, Susan Tredethlyn."

"Her name was Susan," answered Mr. Sanders, "I've heard Mrs. Burfield's children call her so in this very shop. She came to Coltonslough as governess to Mrs. Burfield's young family."

"A governess!" said Francis, with some slight sense of relief. "She was a governess, then, and not a servant?"

"Oh dear, no! Though Coltonslough being a very small place, you see, sir, and most of the inhabitants being a good deal dependent upon lodgers, which gives a kind of fluctuating character to life, as you may say, sir, a governess in Coltonslough might not be looked upon exactly in the same light as elsewhere. Or, to put it plainer, sir, a governess in Coltonslough would not be expected to be proud."

"Oh, I understand," Mr. Tredethlyn answered, rather bitterly. "Yes, my cousin was a genteel drudge—not so well paid, perhaps, as vulgar drudges, and rather harder worked."

"The young person was always genteel, sir, even to the extent of wearing gloves, which is not looked upon as indispensable in Coltonslough; but in the matter of going errands and opening the door, or carrying in a lodger's teatray at a push, she would not be expected to be proud."

"And she left three years ago?"

"She did, sir."

The postmaster looked very grave as he said this—so grave that Francis Tredethlyn could not fail to perceive that something worse than he had yet heard remained to be told. He was not a man to diplomatise, nor yet to make any display of his emotion, but his breath came a little faster for a few moments, and then he asked, abruptly—

"How did she leave?"

Mr. Sanders hesitated a little, and then said, with some embarrassment—

"Why, Coltonslough bein' a gossiping kind of a place, sir, you're apt to hear ever so many different versions of the same thing, and it isn't for me to say which is right and which is wrong. I think as it's a long story, sir, you'd better hear the rights of it from Mrs. Burfield."

"A long story!" repeated Francis Tredethlyn, in an undertone, "a long story! Ah, my poor little cousin—my poor ill-used girl! And it seems only a little while ago when we played together in the churchyard at Landresdale, in the sunny hour when they let us out of school."

It did seem to him but a very little while since he and his cousin had sat side by side under one of the big yew trees in Landresdale churchyard, dining upon some simple repast of home-made bread and fat bacon, with a dessert of unripe apples, in the drowsy sultriness of a summer noontide. He sat for some few minutes, silently thinking of that departed time. The memory of it seemed almost like a sharp physical pain, now that he knew that some great sorrow, some bitter woman's trial, had come to his cousin. A story about her—a long story! What story should gossiping tongues have to tell of any woman, except a history of suffering and wrong?

He did not press the postmaster to tell him anything further, but he said presently, in an altered voice, a voice that had lost something of its power and ringing vibration:

"I can get to see this Mrs. Burfield, I suppose?"

"Yes, sir; I make no doubt you can. She is a very genteel person, is Mrs. Burfield, which she have known better days, and finds herself often a little drove like with her lodgers. Her house is No. 2, sir, in the Terrace, Trafalgar Square, fronting sideways, and rather slantin' like, to the sea. You can see it, sir, from where you stand."

Following the direction of the postmaster's extended forefinger, Francis Tredethlyn did see a row of unfinished-looking houses, with the inevitable seaside bow-windows, staring out on a patch of waste ground. Why these houses, and almost all the other houses of Coltonslough should have slanted away from the sea, obliging the occupants to look out upon the expanse of waters in a sideways and sinister manner, when they might have been built directly facing that single feature of attraction, was a problem far beyond the comprehension of any visitor to the infantine watering-place.

CHAPTER XI.—A VERY OLD STORY.

MRS. BURFIELD was a pale-faced and pinched-looking person, hollow-cheeked and spare figure, who in these latter days would have inspired a stranger with the idea that she was a rigid disciplinarian of the school founded by Mr. Banting. She looked as if all saccharine and fatty elements had been carefully excluded from her food; and yet, on the other hand, she had none of the muscular energy which might be supposed to result from a carnivorous habit. She was a depressing kind of woman, with thin locks of whity-brown hair dangling upon each side of her thin face, and thin garments hanging limply upon her scant figure, and a thin voice. There was something in Mrs. Burfield's appearance which called up vague images of drizzly days, and pattens, and washing done at home, and a man in the passage clamorous for a water rate, and all the most unpleasant associations of poverty.

She was a woman who prefaced every sentence she uttered with a sigh. She sighed as she admitted to Mr. Tredethlyn that her name was Burfield, as if even that fact were in some manner an affliction. She sighed as she told him, apologetically, that the house was full of lodgers, so she must ask him to step down into the little sitting-room below stairs. And yet, as she subsisted by the letting of lodgings, the crowded state of her house should have been a cause for rejoicing.

Francis had some slight difficulty in conveying his long legs down the narrow little staircase, in which there was a breakneck corner, whence awkward maidservants were wont to precipitate themselves headlong, in company with an avalanche of teathings; but he managed to find his way down somehow or other, and was ushered into a little faded-looking underground parlor, where all the furniture seemed to have undergone a prolonged course of Banting, and where the evidence of children's habitation was untidily visible in every direction. The children were all at school, however, Mrs. Burfield told Francis, with another sigh; though, as she added directly afterwards that they drove her next door to raving madness when they were at home, that fact need scarcely have depressed her.

"I had a governess for them some time back," she said, unconsciously approaching the subject of Mr. Tredethlyn's business with her, "and the young person was very useful to me in many ways but things have been so dull, and lodgers so uncertain, and so close as to rent and kitchen fire, and such like, that I couldn't afford to engage another young person, if I could have found any one as reasonable and as willing as her, which wasn't likely."

Here Mrs. Burfield sighed again, and to her surprise found herself echoed by her visitor.

"It is about that person, the governess, that I have come to inquire," said Francis. "I have reason to believe—I may say that I am almost sure—she is my cousin, very near and very dear to me. Pray tell me all you can about her. I am a rich man, and am looking for my cousin, who has a better claim than I have to the money that has lately come to me. Pray tell me everything—you shall not find me ungrateful. I will make it well worth your while to help me in this matter."

It might be supposed that Mrs. Burfield, being ground into the very dust by the iron heel of poverty, would brighten a little on hearing this promising speech; but she did nothing of the kind, she only sighed rather more plaintively than usual, and remarked, somewhat irrelevantly, that her boys were beginning to grow up now, and the boots they brought out, and the way they wore their things at the knees and elbows, were something awful.

"Tell me all you can about my cousin," urged Mr. Tredethlyn. "Ah, you don't know how long I have been away from England, and how eager I am to find that poor desolate girl. Pray tell me all you know, and quickly."

"It's a long story," said Mrs. Burfield, in the very weakest voice of the grocer, "it's a long story, and goodness knows the rights or the wrongs of it; but if you are her cousin—and you are, I suppose——"

"I do not think there can be any doubt of it," Francis Tredethlyn answered, eagerly. "I do not think there can be any doubt that the person of whom I have heard this morning was my cousin, Susan Tredethlyn."

"The young person to whom I almded called herself Susan Turner."

"Yes, yes. It is only natural she should change her name. She left her home because she had been very much persecuted there. She was no doubt afraid of being taken back, and was anxious to hide herself under a false name."

"If I had known that she had come to me under a false name, never would she have slept a night in this house, I can assure you," returned Mrs. Burfield, with something between a sigh and a shudder.

"She was a good and honest girl, under whatever name she went by, you," surveyed Francis Tredethlyn, "but pray tell me the story."

But Mrs. Burfield could not immediately comply with their request; she had to go into the shop first, to see that "the girl" was hasting some mixture that was being roasted for a very fastidious "lady" who had a body-servant in addition to naked meats; and then she had to go out into a little area, in which the window looked out, and to see that the same person was busy, who dropped her down divers loaves, and dispatched with her as to a certain "tuppenny German," which had been left at the door not long before the previous Tuesday. At last, however, she was able to seat herself opposite poor Francis, and to begin her story, from the bottom of which she seemed to derive a dismal kind of enjoyment.

"It's close upon seven years since my poor dear husband died," Mrs. Burfield began, "and at that little time Francis Tredethlyn was afraid that she was going to favor him with a sketch of her own personal history, rather than of any other which he was so eager to know. "It's close upon seven years, seven years of toil and trouble for me, and up to that time I had not known what it was to want for anything, in a moderate way. He was managing clerk in an insurance office, sir, and was as fine looking a man as you need wish to see; but he was taken—sudden—and I was left alone to provide for four young children. Well, sir, I paid the funeral expenses handsome, and genteely brought up, things seemed to go harder with me than they go with some people; and at last an uncle, on my father's side, who was very wealthy, and lately retired from the patent chinacrepot business, gave me enough to buy a little furniture, and start from Bloomsbury."

"It's been a hard life, sir, but I shouldn't have so much minded that if it hadn't been for the children; I couldn't bear to see them running wild upon the shore, or playing with vulgar, dirty children on the waste ground; so, a little better than four years ago, I came to this place, and got a person to take care of them, who'd be a kind of governess to them, and would give me a helping hand in the shop, whose wife and children were full, and wouldn't want above a few pounds a year, just to get herself a new gown once in a way, and so on.

"Well, sir, I inquired for such a person, but for you might just as well inquire for anything you wanted on Holborn Hill, where a shade at a farthing, though, unless it's Queen's taxes and poor rates, and you can have plenty of them without asking, to at last come to the poor-house. Then in she Saunders at the post-office—Why don't you address in the Times, Mrs. Burfield? I'll cost you a trifle, but you're sure to get what you want. So she long and the short of it was, I did advertise for a genteel person who would undertake to teach young children, and make herself generally useful, in consideration of a comfortable home and a honorarium of ten pounds per annum. Mr. Saunders advised me to put it in the light of a honorarium, as he said it looked more that way. A young person from the country preferred, I stated in the advertisement, for the reason that lodgers from London bring down with their luggage, and then turn round upon you and object to the bedding, had quite a mortal age against Loomers.

"Well, sir, I got a good many answers, but the best were the letter we signed Susan Turner, so I wrote to Miss Turner—the address was at a little coffee-house near the Great Western terminus —and I had a line in reply, that she'd come down to Coltonslough for an interview, I would be here or perhaps one way. Well, she came, and I found her a very pleasant-spoken, genteelish-looking young person, and I took to her at first sight to that degree, that I allowed her to come to me without reference, she was so prepossessing, as she told me with her relations in the country."

"She came to you at once, then?"

"Yes, she stayed with me there and then, not saying to go back to London, the strangeness of which frightened her, she said; and she had no luggage, except a little bit of a carpetbag, full of things, which she sent for next day; and then by-and-bye the trunk came out, that she'd run away from home. But she had a couple of sovereigns, and she went out and bought herself a few more things, and made herself as neat and somedevisable as she could. She didn't make much secret of how she'd left her home, poor girl. Her father had wanted her to marry against her own wishes, she said, and in her fear of him she had run away."

"Poor girl! poor girl!"

"Well, sir," sighed Mrs. Burfield, "we got on very comfortable for some months. I never had a young person more kind or more willing. The children took to her as if she'd been their own sister, and as to the shop—for it was a good, industrious young person. Things had gone pretty comfortable with me that season, and in the autumn, quite busy, going on for November, when people don't expect to see a single lodger in all Coltonslough, what should I hear, one afternoon, but a double knock at my door; and who should I see when I opened it but a tall, handsome-looking gentleman in a blue military cloak, a grand coat, and took the rooms, off-hand, and without so much as inquiring what the terms would be, which, considering the lodging and boarding down I'd been accustomed to in the very best part of the season, seemed almost like a dream."

Mrs. Burfield had warmed with her subject, and had refreshed for some time from the relief of a sigh; but she paused now to indulge herself in a very much deeper one, as she proceeded to the question upon the sorrows of a lodging-house keeper, went on:

"He came in at one of the handsomest, easiest-spoken gentlemen I ever met with, and he seemed to take away one's breath almost, he had such a dashing kind of way with him. He was tall about your eyes, you'd almost have fancied him on horseback, galloping away for dear life. He seemed all the better for being lame, if I may use the observation. 'Now I dare say you'll want references,' he said, 'and if so, I can't give you any better than Lord Ellesmere, for I don't know I ever absent. But you can have some rent in advance, if that'll do, and I've no end of luggage, that's all.' And then he flung himself into one of the arm chairs, and burst out laughing when it creaked and groaned, as it were, under him; for I'm sorry to say, sir, that one of the well-seasoned, female's furniture than if they was so many Ojibbeway Indians—and I can't deny that the gentleman was rather inquiring, but I didn't like the strange gentleman making game of them, somehow, for he had such a pleasant way with him, and was such a fine, handsome man, and so handsome, that he seemed quite to brighten up the place.

"He said, he said, presently, 'can you guess why I came to Coltonslough in the month of November?' And of course I told him no, I couldn't, as he hadn't mentioned his business when he took them. Upon which he burst out laughing again. 'I came here,' he said, 'because I was told Coltonslough was the most dismal place upon the surface of the earth, and I meant to stay here till after Christmas. So you may tell the man you're going to bring a fresh lock and key about it.' Upon which the flyman brought in a couple of big portmanteaus, and a gunnace, and a hatbox, and two or three other things, that I ever came into my passage. 'Books, ma'am, books, every one of them, and all as heavy as bricks,' said the perspiring gentleman, as some of the boxes went scratching and humping upon the paper—and the way lodgers' boxes do scratch and bump is—and then he paid me a week's rent quite awful. But for all that I wasn't sorry to see plenty of luggage, though the hooks might have nearly broken down with the weight, for I always know to happen in this very terrace. 'Well, ma'am,' says the gentleman, when his luggage was all brought in, and the flyman had driven off, 'now I can settle down comfortably. Do I look as if I'd been phleged, do you think, ma'am?' he asked, looking at me with a look that made my hands deep down in his pockets, which was one of those ways of his that I certainly call prancing. I didn't quite catch his meaning at first, though, he had alluded to something unpleasant, so I said 'No, indeed, I should think not.' 'But I have, ma'am,' he said, 'and very bad, too. I was measuring sort of a way, as if I'd been a fivebarred gate, and he was just going to fly clean over me—I and his horse, I mean, sir—to get to another of his galloping ways. 'But I have been phleged, ma'am,' he said, 'as clean as any fowl that ever was trussed and stuffed from the poulterer's. I'm a featherless biped, ma'am. So I've come down to Coltonslough, being as I understand, the dullest hole upon the face of the earth, I mean to go in a perisher.' 'A perisher,' was his expression. 'And I mean to read like old boots, so you may let your servant light my fire, for I'm going to read some chops; for I suppose I must resign myself to an existence sustained upon chops so long as I'm at Coltonslough.'"

REBEL IRONCLAD ATTACK ON CITY POINT, VA.

At two o'clock on the morning of Jan. 24th a rebel fleet, consisting of the ironclads Virginia, Richmond and Fredericksburg, two steam gunboats and a number wooden vessels, came down the James river, apparently intending to fire City Point, where the depots and supplies offered a rich bait. A freshet in the river lifted them safely over the obstructions which we had constructed below Dutch Gap Canal, with the exception of the heavy ironclads Virginia and Richmond, which grounded, when the Fredericksburg turned to rejoin them.

A furious engagement between all the vessels of the rebel fleet and the batteries on shore, as well as with the Union batteries, on the other, was then commenced, and was continued from early on Tuesday morning till between 12 and 1 o'clock in the afternoon. About daybreak a shell from one of the Union guns exploded in the magazine of the rebel iron Brooklyn, and blew her up.

After suffering this disaster they returned dismantled towards Richmond. Some rebel troops which were landed on Farrar's island, in the chance for the purpose of co-operating with the fleet, were driven off by a Union force. Their forces plan resulted in failure. The Union casualties in the whole affair were very slight.

REVIEW OF KILPATRICK'S CAVALRY,

And Enthusiastic Reception of Secretary Stanton, at Savannah, Ga.

On the 12th of January a grand review was had of Kilpatrick's cavalry in front of the blockhouse in Bay street, by Gen. Sherman, in the presence of Secretary Stanton and a brilliant group of Major and Brigadier Generals, besides a numerous staff corps. The day was auspicious, and thousands of soldiers and civilians witnessed the pageant.

After the review Col. Barnum proposed to the crowd to give cheers for Gen. Sherman, Gen. Sherman, and his army. Secretary Stanton gracefully acknowledged the compliment by bowing from his carriage, and immediately after a fine gray mare presented him three cheers and a tiger for President Lincoln. The salute commences parrallel with Mr. Stanton, and arrives anon, after unsuccessful calls from the crowd for a speech.

THE SLEICHRIDE.

THE hardest of all things to describe is that which everybody is familiar with. An English author has said, that everybody thinks that he can edit a paper, keep an hotel, practice physic, manage a theatre, play the violin and drive a sleigh. If the reader knows anything about sleigh driving, he knows that it is a very difficult matter, requiring the nicest nerve, steadiness of wrist, and a general indifference to results. It sometimes happens that a man is considered a coarse horse fancier; modern winters are not what they used to be. Snow no longer rests upon the ground from November to March, it is up sometimes in the afternoon. The effect is, that sleighing has ceased to be the fine artit was in the days of our fathers.

"Hear the sledges with the bells—
Silver bells.
What a world of merriment their melody foretells!
How they tinkle, tinkle, tinkle,
In the icy air of night!
While the stars that oversprinkle
All the heavens seem to twinkle
With a crystalline delight;
Keeping time, time, time,
In a sort of Runic rhyme
To the tinkling of the bells, bells, bells."

A sleighride, however, depends very much upon whom you have for company. Ladies always prefer sweet bells to jingling bells.

On the road to Harlem there was a bridge called the "kissing bridge," the toll for passing which we leave to the imagination of young ladies. It is only those who have had the excitement of a race on sleighs, who can appreciate the fun that purposes by the rebels, for there are several miles of the road where it is impossible to turn out, so that if any one explodes it will fall them and not our own men."

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

THE late King of Prussia once sent to an aide-de-camp, Col. Malachowski, who was busy in court, a small packet of letters, marked like a bank-note, as it contained 100 crowns; some time afterwards he met the colonel, and said to him:

"Ah, well, how did you like the new work which I gave you?"

"Excessively, sire," replied the Colonel, "I found it a most delightful occupation, and I enjoyed it with great impatience."

He had smiled, and when the officer's birthday arrived, he presented him with another portfolio, similar to the first, in which, on the back, these words encreased upon it:

"The last is complete in two volumes."

EVERYBODY has laughed at the way in which Washington Irving relates the famous oak hewitt, which Hendrick Hudson had to give the Indians for fish, the constable to pay the costs. We have seen nothing better than it.

A jury in Cohoes, N. Y., rendered the following curious verdict:

"The jury find for the defendant, against the plaintiff, $31, and each man add that McC——the plaintiff's wife witness) pay the costs."

THE last wicked story of Paris is, that there is a matrimonial agency in that city, where the advertising herself on her youth and beauty, she has had the misfortune to marry a man who is old and rich, to be examined on oath. They both had to state their age in the court of justice.

"Your age, madame?" asks courteous judge.

"I am not yet thirty-nine, monsieur."

A little later the son is in the box.

"Your age, sir?" asks the judge.

"Why," answers ingenuous youth, "I find, to my astonishment, that I am a year older than my mother."

JUDGE GRIFFITH, on the bench in B——, appointed a crier whose want of sense was more than made up by the size of his voice. He was seated at the bar, with more fun than legal lore in him, was fond of playing off on the unwary. One day Judge ordered the crier to call Jesse Logue.

The crier, standing at the door of the court, whispered to Jesse:

"Pro-log-ue!"

Prologue looked around the crier.

"Mon-o-logue," said the lawyer.

Monologue looked at the crier.

"Pro-log-ue!"

And the crier still cried "Prologue!"

"Dia-logue."

Some portentious crier shouted "Dialogue!" at the top of his voice.

Despairing of hearing no response from the Logue family, the crier turned and said to the Court, stating in the usual manner of criers, what had occurred:

"I've called all the logs in town, and never one of them will come to the court-house."

A CASE OF LEANNESS.—A remarkable case of leanness is mentioned by Lorry, in a priest, who became so thin and dry that his articulation was little less unable to go through the celebration of mass, as the wine would not reach the throat; and to so strange a manner at every genuflexion, that the faithful were terrified, and left the church in a body. In these remarkable little once undertook a long journey to consult a famous physician on the wall condition, and having begged to know, in a most piteous tone, the cause of his disease, was favored with the following pleasantry:

"Sir, there is a predisposition in your constitution to make you lean, and a disposition in your constitution to keep so."

Another master priest being told that the celebrated Harry Hotspur had died of a big pear eaten, exclaimed, with a deep sigh,

"Ah, well, Mr. Hunter had mine."

HOUSE SURGEON—"Ah, by the way, there's Biggins's case; there has been a slight mistake—it was the good leg I cut off."

Visiting Surgeon—"It's of no consequence, we can cure rather."

SLEIGHING SCENE IN THE COUNTRY—"BLOOD WILL TELL."

WARREN LELAND'S OVERLAND TRIP

Through the Gold and Silver Regions of North America.

WARREN LELAND has hitherto been celebrated as the pioneer of the California press, and as one of the most successful hotel-keepers on this continent. He has also gained considerable distinction as a farmer; his vegetable and animal specimens fully entitling him to the gold medals of the most exacting horticultural and cattle societies. He must now rank among the most adventurous and extensive travellers of modern times; since, within the space of four months, he has travelled across the whole American continent at its broadest parts; visited all the principal points on the route; explored a subterranean city of silver; examined the standing woods; of the regions he traversed; conversed with most of the leading men of the different States through which he passed; had his buffalo, deer, grizzly bear and Indian hunts; hobnobbed with Brigham Young; danced and flirted with his wives, and, to use his own words, fully satisfied himself that this is a great country, and that New York is the biggest and best place in it.

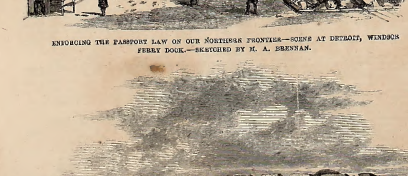
There is something very typical of the American race, that a man of competence, free hand, surrounded by all the luxuries of modern civilization, and engaged in a most extensive business, should voluntarily dress himself up in a bonanza, travel from New York to Atchison, a pleasant little jaunt of 1,200 miles, from Atchison to Fort Kearney, a mere step of 250 miles, from Fort Kearney to Denver city, a trifle under 400 miles, from Denver city to Salt Lake city, a trifle over 600 miles, from Salt Lake city to Fort Hall, 300 miles, thence to Virginia city, thence to Boise city, 300 miles, to Walla-walla, 300, to Portland, 325, Victoria, Vancouver's Island, 150 miles, thence to San Francisco by steamer, 1,000 miles; but here we must pause, entirely out of breath with these magnificent distances.

The reader must remember, however, that we have only taken Mr. Leland one half of his journey, since, of course, he has got to come back. We have to those who are profoundly skilled in arithmetic the task to of adding up the sum total. Having given some idea of the distance travelled, let us state the time in which it was done, exactly four months. For our land, Columbus left New York on the 18th of September and returned on the 18th of January. From Atchison, Mr. Leland journeyed in one of the light but comfortable and substantial coaches of the Overland stage line to Guideville.

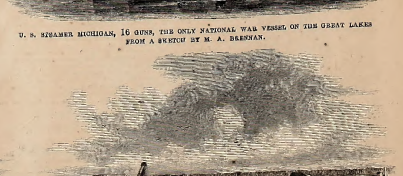
We cannot help noticing the newfangled manner with which Mr. Leland treats himself. He is evidently an admirer of Cesare's Commentaries, a work remarkable for the total absence of that fascinating little word, Ego.

Our space will only permit us to include in a few extracts from Mr. Leland's most interesting journal, with part of which the public are doubtless familiar, since a portion of it was recently published in the N. Y. Herald. Our readers will enjoy the entry dated October 24:

"Corcoran. 24.—Left for Virginia City, Montana Territory, West on a grizzly hear hunt with Paul Cebrario, stage agent, and John Haley, an old mountaineer. After a day's search, encountered an awful grizzly at the head of the cañon. The brute showed fight. After using a degree of strategy that would have exorted admiration from Gen. Grant, we finally brought old grizzly down, but not until half a dozen balls had penetrated his carcase. Extracted one of his tusks, four inches long, which was awarded to me as a trophy for making the death shot. Found the city flourishing in a high degree, with plenty of gold dust, which was the only circulating medium. The city is well supplied with liquors and dence saloons and the usual accompaniments of rich mining towns. Beverages are purchased by each—that is, a person wanting a glass of whiskey drops a certain quantity of his precious dust, which is weighed out by the saloon proprietor, and any overplus returned to the imbiber. Notwithstanding this slow process the number of the drinking population in Virginia City does not seem to be less in proportion than where postage currency is the medium of exchange for the nectar."



MR. WARREN LELAND, IN THE COSTUME WORN DURING HIS LATE TRIP AMONG THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS.



Of a very different description is the chief hunt, which our traveller joins in. We can imagine the look of mild horror which must have come over the genial connoisseur's features as the savory morsel was handed to him. We question if he will ever look over his simple bill of fare with out seeing printed in imaginary type, "Roast Horse, Sauvage, with baked Indian, of the Snake persuasion." It is a refinement on the Chinese Ethel Pappy Regent, and the Bird Nest Epicures. Mr. Leland, who is one of the proprietors of the Metropolitan Hotel of this city, and of the Union Hotel, Saratoga, knows what a cuisine should be.

"NOVEMBER 4.—Arrived at Raft River Station. Here I met a chief of the Snake tribe of Indians, named Yam-Patch, with his two sons, White Ox and Elk Horn. Horse stealers had been committing depredations, and one horse was stolen from this stage station. Yam-Patch and his tribe being friendly to the whites were anxious to have the horse restored, and wanted me to accompany him and his sons to hunt up the thief. Went out about 15 miles to the foot of the mountains, and just inside of the cañon came in sight of the Indian in the act of skinning the horse which he had killed for the purpose of eating the meat. The moment Yam-Patch saw that the chief had killed the horse, he drew up his rifle and fired at the Indian, but missed him. The horse thief returned the compliment by firing at Yam-Patch, the bullet passing through his left arm and into the fleshy part of his side. At this instant White Ox rushed close up to the thief, and fired two charges of shot into his body, killing him instantly, and taking his scalp the next second. I thought the hunt was over, but Yam-Patch insisted on my remaining to eat the meat. The subsequent scenes were interesting, but shocking to a Christian. Yam-Patch sent the scalp off to notify others of the tribe—and had purposely started towards night a party of Snakes, with their squaws and papooses, arrived on the ground. Each one then set to work gathering sage brush, and after having accumulated a huge pile upon the body of the dead Indian, set the mass on fire, consuming the body and roasting the horse at the same time. The hereditah was then distributed in chunks and strips to the fascinating Snakes, and a regular savage hullabaloo and hereid war dance was kept up the entire night. I was several times offered a roasted piece of the delicious carcase, but respectfully declined, not so much on account of any superstitions I had to good horseflesh well cooked, but from a decided objection to having the dish flavored with 'baked Indian,' a Snake delicacy. This performance lasted all night. It was the wildest scene I ever witnessed, or expect to, on or off any stage. Was presented by Yam-Patch's son, White Ox, with the dead Indian's scalp, which pretty toy I intend to carry home with me."

We cannot resist quoting the complimentary greeting he gave to his young nephews, upon the admirable manner in which they were conducting business, and the popularity they enjoyed among the traveling public and the leading citizens of the Pacific States. Bode out to the Cliff House, went to the opera, theater and minstrels, attended a wedding, visited all the public buildings, saw the big piles of silver bricks and gold bars in the mint and great banking-houses, saw Ruggles and his celebrated rock of four, visited the vineyards and wine-growing localities, spent a day with Marsh examining his herd of Durhams, his flock of horses, visited the Agricultural Society's exhibition, witnessed the launching of the first Pacific-built steamship the Pioneer, and finally left for Puget Sound, Bid Norte. Tried to find the city of Puget Sound, but couldn't succeed. The entire city Pacific coast—but couldn't succeed. The entire city having been rebuilt and remodelled during the past few years."

MARINE BATTERY IN THE REAR OF BATTERY LAWTON, ON THE SAVANNAH RIVER, GA. FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, W. T. CRANE.

The next extract will doubtless lead the numerous fair friends of our traveller to breathe either for Brigham Young or for Mr. L. Ha! we are happy to say, Mr. Leland gazed, with unmoveable eye, upon the fair of the saints before him, and like a second Queen Elizabeth, "passed on in maiden meditation, fancy free!" Whether any of the twenty-three Mrs. Brigham Youngs ever dream of Mr. Leland is more than we can tell:

"DECEMBER 23.—In Salt Lake City attended the annual ball given by Brigham Young to the members of the city council, city officials, the church officers, including the twelve apostles, bishops, chief church officers, and their families, being the only families besides the officials, invited couples were present. About two hundred couples were present. The hall was well supplied with refreshments, and the ball dressed, and everything arranged according to the highest taste of the fashionable code regulating such entertainments. The ballroom was spacious, and also well lighted and ventilated. Prayers were uttered previous to partaking of the bountiful repast, which was commenced at 10 o'clock, and continued until 2 o'clock. The music by the band was of the most delightful character, and performed in a manner that many years ago and a long line of prosy still before him!"

One more extract and we have done. It reads more like a passage in a fairy tale than a sober letter of the 19th century:

"DECEMBER 12.—In Virginia city stopped at the International Hotel: met a number of prominent bankers, lawyers, merchants and capitalists, and took an entire day in the Opera House in the Comstock lode. Descended 300 feet into the mine; the appearance being very much that of a river city under ground, with 'adits,' 'drifts,' and 'crosscuts' resembling the streets and lanes of a city—the sparkling ore on all sides reflecting our lights, and presenting, in the aggregate, a magnificent sight. Also a number of fact and scene of enchantment. Travelled four or five miles in the wonderful subterranean region in company with Mr. A. E. Davis, President of the Opera Company. Mr. Davis' manners and appearances here were but the counterpart of those in several other large cities in the Comstock lode."

Our picture of Mr. Leland represents him in his travelling suit—a dress every one must envy him during this cold weather.

HOSTETTER'S

CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the counterfeits, spurious imitations and base frauds, upon which unscrupulous men are reaping a golden harvest, that every person requiring a medicine should be careful to procure the genuine article. HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these frauds, but are a combination of pure Roots—the only true juices of the most valuable herbs—with pure spirits and spiceral barks and plants; stomachic, anti-bilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a medicine, this preparation stands before all its kindred compounds, a rival or competitor. Its sales today are equal to the combined sales of the six other bitters advertised in the United States, and the certificates which annually accompany them are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. Beware of imitations and impostors.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical PINEAPPLE CIDER

IS A PREVENTIVE OF SICKNESS. The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years to winess the many diseases that arise from impure water that will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Cider, obtained from all diseases, old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but special. Twenty years ago the experiment was tried with a well person one year: this is rather a new mode of using the medicine. The directions for using are as follows: Add one teaspoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a pint of cold water, and drink the first thing after you rise in the morning, and the same before you retire at night. It will increase your appetite and give vigor and action to the system. A celebrated Physician, however, says he has made a thorough test of the Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that he gained two pounds per day on the average of the time that he continues its use as above directed, and finds it very beneficial when used in connection with certain forms of sickness in his case. Also, another well-known gentleman in New York, who has been afflicted with Consumption for ten years, and has not been able one day during that time.

Price $3 per bottle (full quart); pints, $2; half-pints, $1 50. One bottle will last a person for a week. For great bottles, sent free by Express on receipt of price. All orders should be addressed to

CERTIFICATE.

I have thoroughly tested the new "National Revolver" and find it an effective weapon, of sure fire and convenient size. At fifty yards I think I could with this pistol kill at every shot. I take pleasure in recommending it as a weapon in every way desirable. In company with Captain Scott, Provost-Marshal, and other officers I fired this pistol a large number of times, and not one cartridge failed to explode.

Amendment of the Constitution.

"NEITHER SLAVERY NOR INVOLUNTARY SERVITUDE, EXCEPT AS A PUNISHMENT FOR CRIME, WHEREOF THE PARTY SHALL HAVE BEEN DULY CONVICTED, SHALL EXIST WITHIN THE UNITED STATES OR ANY PLACE SUBJECT TO THEIR JURISDICTION."

Such are the momentous words of the proposed amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which, after having passed the Senate by the requisite vote, also passed the House of Representatives, by a vote of two-thirds, on the 31st of January—a day from which will date a new and brighter era in American History. To become a part of the Constitution, however, this amendment must be accepted and approved by three-fourths of all the States of the Union, through their Legislatures. That is to say it must be accepted by twenty-seven of the thirty-six States now composing the Union. It has already received the sanction of eight States, the Legislatures of which are now in session, viz.: Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, West Virginia, Michigan and Illinois. Action will be speedily had in most of the remaining States not in rebellion, and in such of those as are now in process of reorganization. It is apprehended that Delaware, New Jersey and Kentucky will reject the amendment, and possibly prevent its adoption by the requisite three-fourths of all the States, for the present—we say, for the present, inasmuch as the Constitution does not limit the time within which action may be taken, and any subsequent Legislature in these States may affirm the amendment, and complete the act. Such is the course and force of public sentiment, that it will be hard for the Legislatures of these States long to resist it—and that public sentiment is for the extirpation of slavery, "the evil cause of all our woes."

This is not the first attempt to amend the Constitution. Amendments were made, in the mode prescribed by the instrument itself, through votes of two-thirds of both Houses of Congress, and by the affirmative action of three-fourths of the States, in 1791, 1798 and 1804. None of these, however, proposed any great or radical changes.

The passage of the amendment now before this country, by Congress, was hardly expected by the public. No longer ago than in July last, precisely the present proposition was rejected by the House of Representatives, or rather failed to receive the requisite two-thirds vote. The advance which has taken place since then, in public sentiment, and the strength of that sentiment itself, as evinced in the November election, have not, however, been without their effect in Washington. They have reacted powerfully on the people's representatives, who only anticipated the inevitable action of the next Congress by their own somewhat tardy motion.

It is impossible to overestimate the importance of the great measure now before the country. It proposes a short, direct and effective mode of disposing of a question, and settling an issue, which we have sought to evade, or to achieve by partial, doubtful and round-about means—"gradual Emancipation," "compensated Emancipation," and Executive Proclamations. All preceding measures, it is true, only marked the advance in public sentiment, and it was through them that the nation was gradually brought face to face with the monster which we now propose to struggle outright, and without farther grace. Once achieved, this great national act will stand unparalleled in history for grandeur. To strike the fetters from four millions of men, at a single blow, and to strike out of rateable existence two billions of property, is no ordinary act of justice and of sacrifice. For this, posterity will give us award; but from the nations of Europe, who measure our great and bloody struggle by their own mean and selfish standards, we must expect neither praise nor appreciation.

The proposed amendment, if adopted, will give to the rebellious States, on their return into the Union, an increase of political power—a power, however, from which we have nothing to fear, as it will be no longer directed by the malignant influences of slavery. Under the Constitution as it was and is, three-fifths of the slaves are counted in the representative enumeration; that is to say, in apportioning representatives every five slaves count as three whites. This enabled the South to send into Congress a much greater number of representatives than they would have been entitled to, if their representation were based on a voting population. Of this the Northern and Free States rightly complained. Slaves being accounted property, and having no privilege of exercising political rights, it was justly claimed that Northern property should equally enter into the basis of Northern representation. Why should five slaves, worth $500 each, have, practically, three votes—or enable their master to cast that number—while the Northern farmer's ten horses, worth $250 each, gave him no accession of political power?

But, the slaves once free, they will, under the Constitution, be entitled to count their full number in Congressional apportionment—that is, the Southern States, which segregate the slaves to remain where they are, will have an addition, equal to two-thirds of the whole number of emancipated slaves, to their basis of representation. This, therefore, as we said before, will give a considerable accession to the political power of the South; for, as the qualification of voters is fixed by each State, while the basis of representation is fixed by the Constitution, the States may disfranchise those whom the pending amendment will make free.

This effect of the amendment, if carried, has probably not occurred to many minds; and it is one which will bring up the question of negro suffrage at an early day and with powerful force. The question must come up, shall the present masters of slaves receive an accession of political power, on the fact that their slaves have become freemen, under the operations of an amended Constitution? On the other hand, it may be asked, by those who object to give this right of suffrage to the newly emancipated slave, steeped in the ignorance entailed by slavery: "is such an accession of power dangerous, when the motive for its illegitimate exercise shall no longer exist?"

Frank Leslie's Lady's Illustrated Almanac for 1865.

This annual contains a greater amount of useful and entertaining information than any publication of the kind ever issued. It is indeed the only Lady's Illustrated Almanac published. It is profusely filled with over 70 beautiful engravings, by the finest Artists of the day, executed in the highest style of the art. It contains Illustrations for the parlor, bull-room, boudoir, store-room, kitchen, garden, nursery, and play-ground. In a word, it is the matron's sole mentor, as well as the young lady's bosom friend, and it should be in every family circle. In addition to general illustrations, it contains splendid portraits of Mrs. Lincoln and Mr. McClellan, engraved on steel, and a graphic Battle-Scene at Long Branch, printed on tinted paper. The Frank Leslie's Manual—which contains more reading matter than an octavo volume—is also filled with plates. It will be sent postage free, on receipt of the price, either in currency or postage stamps. Address

It contains valuable information, Astronomical, Political, Statistical, Astronomical and Useful, besides upwards of 50 beautiful Engravings, by the best European and American Artists, engraved in the highest style of the art. It is also embellished with four splendid Lithographic Portraits, printed on fine paper, of General Grant, Admiral Farragut, and Admiral Farragut, from recent photographs. Price 70 cents.

Having had Frequent Occasion to Use

PERRY DAVIS'S PAIN KILLER for Colic in Horses, and seeing it used by others, I can say that I regard it as the best preparation extant, for the relief in time, or in the first stages of that very prevalent complaint. I have recommended it to all persons in my employ, and have found it to be a sure and speedy remedy. For the human family, both as an internal and external remedy, I know it is so extensively known, that it is almost useless to call attention to it.

Very truly yours,

Rumors of Peace.

THE air is hurtling with rumors of peace, which, however, have as yet had no effect except to no longer fix Rock Enough as a stop estimente—the latter, probably, being the principal object sought to be accomplished by the authorities in Richmond. While we pant about peace, the land is trod broken up by Sherman are repairing; the rebel army of the south-west, under Taylor (lately Hood), is taking breath and binding up its wounds, and the united diabolism of the country and negroes are redoubling the defences of Richmond, while the so-called Southern Confederacy generally is recovering from the stunning blow inflicted by Terry and Porter at Fort Fisher. The Blairs have been to Richmond, "The hury Fs," of whom Dr. Watts or somebody wrote:

"How do the little busy Blairs
Improve the shining hours,
And find out ways to keep themselves cares
To close this war of ours?"

And on return for the Blairs, there have been peace platforms constructed—some, such as Stephens, the inglorious Vice-President of Dixie, the eminent F. F. V. Hunter, of Virginia, and Judge Campbell, of Alabama.

That the Blairs and the Confederates did not come in; on the contrary, Mr. Seward went, and afterwards Mr. Lincoln went—all went to Fortress Monroe, where each and everybody had a steamer of his own. And there was what our colored brethren in Africa call a palaver, and what our "wild salvages" term a pow-wow, and then each and everybody went to his own—as the Irishman said of the war—"in the end on't." Except that it has afforded large latitude to able correspondents hard up for wherewithal to write about, and an opening for operations to Exchange brokers eager for a "movement" in the market; and except, particularly, to the rehels who hereby gain time to raise men, reorganise, and offer a more obstinate and protracted resistance.

There is no peace to be had except on the basis of complete submission to the authority of the nation; none to be had which does not involve the entire destruction of the only real world knows this; the people at home and the armies in the field know it, and will listen to nothing less. Then the rebel assents to the two prime conditions, the insignificant matters of confiscation and the penalties of treason can readily be waived, while all parties and sections unite in conveying "the old flag" to the topmost peaks of national power and greatness. But short of this there can be no peace. Five hundred thousand patriot dead would spring from their unmarked graves, and lift their bony hands in menace against the cravens who would sacrifice the cause for which they poured out the willing sacrifice of their blood.

The President of the United States cannot make peace without the full concurrence of the nation. He is only the exponent of the national will, as ratified by the declaration of the people. Abraham Lincoln, rail-splitter and late country lawyer of Illinois, is absolutely nobody, per se—nobody, except in so far as he is the President, in personality of the sentiment of the people. To the people he will doubtless, and right speedily, explain what the so-called Southern commissioners had to propose. Until then the President of the United States, he has nothing to propose. When the Prodigal Son came home, the benignant father killed the fatted calf and choped the prodigal's head off. Whether Mr. Davis or Vice-President Stephens comes to tell us that he, and those who act with him, are anxious and willing to return under (to use his language) "the best Government the world ever saw," and to submit to the restrictions that their own conduct has rendered necessary to secure peace and permanence, then we may accept their return in the spirit as did the father of the wayward son. Nothing more—nothing less.

A LONDON journal hitherly denounces the Davenport brothers as impudent and profane impostors, and is specially indignant with the people who "allow themselves to become the service of the conjurors by getting up committees of investigation. "Investigate," it exclaims, "Investigate what? Whoever went to Robert Houdin's performances to investigate? whoever investigates the machinery by which Professor Anderson changes a rabbit into a gold watch? There is no more reason why we should not, a month, if he were to give his attention to it, produce all the illusions which the Davenport pass off as supernatural agency. Only think of it, supernatural beings engaged in tying knots, carrying guitars about, and playing a few bars of nigger melody. What is the music of the spheres, if 20 bars of 'Buffalo Gals, won't you come out to-night,' is the best production of which the angels are capable? The men who tell us that they are waited upon by celestial beings for these purposes would cause laughter, did they not rouse contempt and stir up indignation."

M. LEMOINE, one of the ablest writers for the French press, has published an able and caustic article in the Journal des Debats, in Paris, on the fats, etc., lately held in England, for the aid of the so-called Southern Confederacy. Some of these, it will be remembered, were managed by English women, of whom M. Lemoinne says:

"At the moment when the whole trading in bales and selling goods for charitable purposes in America, but which are destined for the benefit of the rebels of Southern House, Uncle Tom. The good Cotton now rules the day. Oh, Mr. Secretary, you will pay your grand scale, I thought, if, unhappily for itself, it could see the England which you had raised from the abyss of the slave trade to a humanity falling back into the empire of calico? Is it that the Christian Associations of England are responsible partiality for the rebellion still bring about their blind, bloody trade? Is it that the Anti-Slavery Society has emerged from this terrible trial, without its slavery, but, alas! with a great number of its members and its officers who has submitted to during the conflict; and that this day come cotton will be dearer than ever."

Among the Ephemera of 1848 was M. Louis Blanc—a member of the Provisional Government of France after the beyira of Louis Philippe, and before the Empire—who, with Ledru Rollin and peror, and the ruler of France, was enabled to rise to power, as "the nephew of his uncle." The republic governed by the "Prince President," was not large enough for M. Louis Blanc, who has since resided in London, where he has done a little literary hack work, and a great historical line. A correspondent of the Boston Tyrannical says of him:

"He is now, apparently, supporting himself mainly by his contributions to certain French journals which still maintain the cause of the banished Republic. Indeed, M. Louis Blanc is very short, and has almost the appearance of a boy. He is very nervous, very strong and earnest one, his eyes keen and full of power. He speaks in a quick, sharp voice, having almost a common accent, and for removal from the usual fancy which characterizes the French gentleman. The French Government has granted him permission to return, but he prefers London to Paris, and is so well versed in our literature and understands the genius of our language so well, that he feels himself at home among Englishmen. He writes English better than most who inherit its use, retaining the point and sharpness of expression of the usual French style, without its formal stiffness."

THERE has been published in Richmond a series of what may be called Historical Annals of the War, characterised by considerable ability—from the pen of a gentleman named Pollard, who had the good or bad fortune of being caught, some time ago, in a blockade-runner, and thus obtained free lodgings in one of our great national hotels in Boston or New York harbors, whence he fruitlessly appealed to Lord Lyons to relieve him. In due time, however, he was released "because," for some Yankee knight of the pen "in durance vile" in Dixie, or was let loose on his parole, to write better historical fictures. And why not, had a week of freedom in New York, where he stopped, of course, at the New York Hotel, and where he had the "run" of all kinds of liquors by way of the security from conscription afforded in the North, while they support the cause of the rebellion, like the Antipodes of a church, from the outside. Mr. Pollard was here during the election, and graphically describes affairs as follows:

"Seven days before the election New York was in accordant with revolution. Processions flaunted banner-and-pike-adorned through the streets, mustered such what was in the Washington definition downright treason. The hoists and barricades were clothed with Secesh—vociferous, defiant, and generally half drunk. Yet there was a singular silence and sheep-like awe about them as suddenly as one of Hicks's spectacles, if not like it in a flock of turnkeys, and in the whole town those whose mouths had been filled with the fumes of revolution, and who had been breathing fire and slaughter, were as quiet as whipped curs, and not a whit more courageous."

Of the Southern refugees who crowd our hotels, specimine in gold, "d—n Lincoln," and are ready to "go" "the whole length of good fellowship" in the varying fortunes of the war, Mr. Pollard has a profound and merited contempt. He says of them:

"There are hundreds and thousands of those sympathetic Americans, who, in the spirit of observant philosophy, have made a deliberate point that Southern patriotism in the garish hotels of New York, and are now basking in the genial fellowship among the generous contorts of Yankeedom, while the beloved people of the South are left to fight for themselves all of the privation and risk of the war. Many of them live extravagantly on the gold brought by impoverished and ruined refugees, dough-faced sojourners, fugitives from conscription, and all that every rebel, who, while boasting and pampering themselves in Yankeedom, talk 'Secesh' and 'Southern rights,' in the New York Hotel is but the spotswood House at Richmond."

Mr. Pollard writes well and so pungently, that we are half inclined to think that he writes under an assumed name, and that we have really "a Daniel come to judgment."

A YOUNG girl from lowe, poor and pretty, has been for a long time looked stirred to madness by the fancy (or reality) of neglect and the mischief of busy tongues, and chasing half-way across the continent the man whom she loves, and who had shudled her in childhood on his knees, she steals near and sees him seated at his desk in the quiet transaction of his daily affairs. The contrast between him so calm, and herself in the toils of her devouring jealousy, is more than she can bear; the pistol is in her hand, and the man falls dead among his brother clerks, who are swarming through the hall in the pleasant hustle of departure.

The highest civilization cannot prevent such instances of unregulated revenge from happening exceptionally, even in the very centre of its legislative and executive of its spiritual. Mesrs. Lyons, Lyons, Nuna, Draco, Justinian, Alfred, Napoleon, may expend the riches of their vast intellects in building a machinery of justice, but the poor can hope for is dividing and isolating the sure percentage of crime, leaving the home to confine the rest in private ways. Their combinations can only not prevent the occasional outbreak of deadly passion. What amelioration can be applied to the unregulated tragedies is a question that belongs to the education of public opinion and the press.

THE object to the attitude in which the erring girl is exposed among the people. What should be felt when a creature so childish exhibits the wild weakness of love will in a fearful and American revenge, is a sensitive shrinking from the whole loathsome, indelicate subject. It is a woman who has been betrayed—that, too, under circumstance and gentle temper can forget; that the pity should be secret, reserved, ashamed—the divine compassion of the sons of Noah. He first recorded gentlemen of history. Instead of this, the world, with its prurient eye expanded, is looking at the shuddering creature writhing and moaning in the shame from the Haman's gibbet of the press. Our legislators publicly visit the poor, weak criminal; Socia Science and the world gossip and sensationise; the victim of their assiduity tries to believe herself somehow a heroine; and all the while the busy tongues of the ladies, having made sure to her confidence "by earnest expressions of sympathy," are pouring out the low undercurse of drivel, which is the only revenge that ever has been shortland curly, that she wore a sabe and a veil, and that at the critical moment she "felt suddenly afraid of her." The eye which has wisely determined that the operatic of an execution is immoral, is feasting upon the hapless homicide, pulleried between the two millstones, with the veil and the cloud all torn from her throbbing womanhood.

THE largest collection of photographic pictures, as well as materials of the photographic art in America, is no doubt that of Messrs. E. H. T. Anthony, 501 Broadway. The stereoscopic gallery of Messrs. Anthony is a marvel of completeness, embracing views of remarkable scenes and places from almost every country of the globe, as well as portraits of leading authors, statesmen, philanthropists and generals of both continents. The extensive collection of negatives will soon be augmented by the addition of an entirely unique series of views from Peru, of remarkable extent and beauty.

Summary of the War.

LOUISIANA.

There have been no military operations in this State since our last. The abolition of slavery in Louisiana, Maryland, Tennessee, and Missouri, was commemorated by a holiday on the 16th of January, in accordance with a proclamation of Governor Hahn. It is reported that Gen. Gordon Granger was advancing on Mobile from Pascagoula with a force of 25,000 men.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Gen. Sherman has commenced his new campaign. The left wing of the army, under Gen. Slocum, had arrived at Sister's ferry, on the Savannah river, 50 miles above the city of Savannah, without meeting any opposition whatever from the enemy. Two divisions of the 20th corps, which struck out for that point through the State of South Carolina, had considerable difficulty in getting through the swamps. The other troops, who marched directly up the Georgia bank of the river, had no such embarrassment to contend with. On the 30th ult. all of Slocum's men were at Sister's ferry, and supplies were being rapidly received. The right wing of the army is operating in a better country for marching than the left, and at some distance from it; but communication between the two is kept uninterrupted. Rebel dispatches say that the left wing is marching on Augusta, Ga., and the right on Branchville, S. C. They report some fighting on the 30th ult. near White's point, on the Combahee river. They also say there is a rumor that the Union troops burned McPhersonville, S. C., five miles north-west of Pocotaligo.

CHARLESTON.

The Patapsco was sunk in the harbor of Charleston, on the night of the 15th of last month, by one of the rebel torpedoes. She went down in 20 seconds after she was struck, and 60 of the persons on board of her were drowned, 43 being saved. The Dai Ching got aground in the Combahee river, S. C., on the 26th ult., and after maintaining a severe fight with a rebel fort for some hours, and it becoming apparent to her officers that she could not get off, they set fire to her, and she was burned to the water's edge. All her officers and crew, excepting four, succeeded in escaping. A few hours previous to the catastrophe which befell her, the Dai Ching captured the blockade-runner Coquette, from Charleston for Nassau, with a cargo of cotton.

ACTIVITY IN THE PETROLEUM REGION.

Capt. J. S. Clark, President of the New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore Petroleum and Mining Company, who has just returned from the oil region, informs us that the greatest activity prevails in every quarter of the region. Much of the district is of course frozen over, but wherever the wells can be worked a busy hive of oil-seekers are sure to be found. The rush of capitalists and small adventurers continues so great that it is utterly impossible to find quarters to accommodate the half of them. Companies of any standing are erecting houses for their superintendents, and to secure a shelter for their officers when they visit their property for the purpose of inspection. Several hotels are going up, and one of colossal proportions is already designed, and will be commenced as soon as the ground is unfrozen. This hotel will be controlled by one of our popular New York hotelkeepers. A general feeling of confidence prevails; prospecting parties are to be met with everywhere, and even the most unpromising property commands a fabulous price. But fabulous as the prices may seem, one little hole drilled down a few hundred feet in the earth may make it appear as nothing when compared with the financial results. The reliable companies are prospering; every day some new source of wealth, in the shape of a flowing well, is discovered. The day after Capt. Clark left he received a telegram from his superintendent stating that he had that day reached oil in another well, and that, in the language of the district, it promised to be a "bully" well. This is good news to the holders of the stock of the New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore Petroleum and Mining Company.

NEW BOOKS, &c.

The latest and most popular production of the musical press is "Sunset," a ballad, for one or two voices, words by Thomas Morse (a rising young Irish poet), and the music by Stephen Massett, one of the "old masters." It is dedicated to Mrs. James Gordon Bennett, the accomplished wife of the "Napoleon of the American press." The words will be remembered as commencing:

"How dear to me the hour when daylight dies,
And sunbeams melt upon the silent sea;
For then sweet dreams of other days arise,
And mem'ry breathes its vesper sigh to thee."

Musical authorities pronounce the harmonies of this production complete; the composer does justice to the melody and sentiment of the poet, and both only fair devoir to the lady "for whom the song is sung."

Among the manifold shapes that the latest production of the Laureate of England reaches us, namely, "Enoch Arden," none is more pleasantly convenient and readable than the edition of J. E. Tilton & Co., of Boston, which, furthermore, contains various other of Tennyson's more popular poems, such as "Aylmer's Field," "Sea Dreams," "The Grandmother," and a dozen more, including "A Welcome to Alexandra."

We have been shown an amusing version of the Opdyke Libel Suit, or, as the funny author has it, Opdyke "verses" Weed—the whole testimony, pleading and final charge being paraphrased in comic poetry. The fun is very good fun. For sale by the various booksellers for the mere joke of 25 cents. The American News company are the agents.

The Philadelphia Evening Bulletin was sold at public auction on the 1st inst., causing a spirited and exciting scene in 3d street. It was bought for the price of $89,000 by Mr. Peacock, in the interest of part of the old Bulletin Association, Messrs. Cummings and Chambers retiring. We may take the present opportunity to mention that this paper, being the principal afternoon sheet, is the favorite advertising vehicle in the city. In Philadelphia everybody gets a Bulletin to see the evening news.

There is room for anything and everything if it be good. Newspapers and periodicals are said to be increasing twenty-fold; but, on the other hand, the number of readers is increasing five hundredfold—

Those now are readers who ne'er read before,
And those who used to read now read the more.

So there is room for the New York Weekly Review, a handsome large quarto, dedicated to art, literature, music and the drama, issued at 7 Mercer street; terms, $4 per annum. It is quite a master in persiflage, a style of writing which is becoming more and more popular with us, as New York comes more and more to resemble Paris. The Review is strong in the departments of music and the drama, and altogether the best publication of its kind in the country, where it worthily fills a space before vacant.

John Bradburn, successor to M. Doolady, New York, has lately published a novel, by Mrs. Hosmer, entitled "The Morrisons." We are somewhat late in noticing this most popular work, which is equally admirable in style, plot and execution. One of our finest critics, in speaking of it, says: "It is refreshing, in these days of sensational trash, to come upon a work which enchains the reader's attention without outraging his critical taste. The characters in this novel are at once interesting and natural. There are no stage villains and trapdoors, no spectral melodramatic effects, but all is natural and full of incident." We must not omit to add that the publisher has issued this volume in a style of unusual elegance both in binding and type.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The four years of continued suffering which the people of Savannah have endured have left an expression of pain upon their faces. Men have remained in their houses for months, without ever going into the streets, for fear of being conscripted; and an instance is mentioned of one man who had not gone outside of his doors for three years.

—— Everybody knows by this time what an epistolary people we are and what epistolary armies we have in the field. Still the wonder at the amount of correspondence will never cease. On the 18th ult., by one mail, over half of million of letters were received at Savannah.

—— A soldier's widow by marrying again forfeits all her pensions from the date of her marriage, and if she again becomes a widow she cannot resume them.

—— The first soirée of the Artists' Association was held in Dodworth's Building on the 24th of January. It was well attended, and the whole affair passed off with great spirit.

—— The new public Petroleum Exchange was formally opened on the 1st of February, in the Empire Buildings, corner of Broadway and Rector.

—— The Commissioner of Internal Revenue has decided that dead man cannot be taxed. The case in point is that of one Mr. George Thompson, who died July 29, 1864. Before his death a return was made by him of his income for the year 1863. A tax of five per cent. was afterwards levied and paid upon it. Mr. Blake, the Collector of the Seventh New York District, now claims the right to impose and collect another tax of five per cent. upon the same income, now in the hands of the executors of the deceased for distribution. The Commissioner decides that this cannot lawfully be done.

—— The Tribune thus queerly announces a most interesting fact: A negro, black as the enemy of mankind, was yesterday admitted to practise as a lawyer in the United States Supreme Court.

—— The Commissioner of Internal Revenue has decided that any one who chooses has the right to copy out and publish the list of assessments, or amount of returns made and taxes paid, by taxpayers.

—— Mayor Gunther has addressed a letter to Corporation Counsel Develin in regard to the proposal of D. D. Badger, for the New York Sanitary and Chemical Compost Company, to clean the streets of this city for $300,000. The Mayor asks if the commission which was appointed in 1864 has any right to act this year, and what are the legal objections, if any, to the proposed contract. Mr. Develin says the powers of commission still exist, but that by giving Mr. Badger the use of the Croton water and the dumping grounds a greater amount would in reality be paid for the work than the Legislature authorised to be given.

—— The Buffalo Express of the 30th Jan. states that there was a smart shock of an earthquake—for to that cause alone it can lay the fact that a little before four o'clock persons were startled from their sleep by a heavy dull explosion, succeeded by a shock, which made the most solid brick houses tremble, and the window frames rattle.

—— The House passed a bill on the 2d of February giving a gratuity of $300 a year to each of the five surviving revolutionary pensions in addition to the pension of $100 which they now receive. In January, 1864, there were only 12 remaining, seven of whom have since died. The names of the only survivors are as follows: Lemuel Cook, enlisted in Hatfield, Mass., 98 years of age, now residing at Clarendon, Orleans co., N. Y.; William Hutchins, enlisted in Newcastle, Me., 100 years of age, residing at Penobscot, Me.; Alexander Maroney, enlisted at Lake George, N. Y., as a drummer boy, 94 years of age, residing at Yates, Orleans co., N. Y.; James Beartham, a substitute for a drafted man in Southampton co., Va., living in Missouri, in his 101st year.

—— The constitutional amendment for the abolition and prohibition of slavery throughout the country has been received by the people with enthusiasm, and is acted upon the Legislature of some of the States with promptness. Already it has been fully ratified by the Legislatures of Illinois, Michigan and Rhode Island, and by one house in that of Maryland, while in those of New York, Massachusetts and other States the ratification measures have been introduced. In a speech which President Lincoln made on Wednesday night, in response to a serenade in honor of the success of the amendment in the House of Representatives, he said that, while some might entertain doubts about the legal validity of the abolition of slavery by his proclamations, none could cavil when it was decreed by the concurrence of three-fourths of the States in the resolution adopted by Congress. In Massachusetts the people manifested their enthusiasm by the ringing of bells and firing of salutes throughout the State. In the West Virginia House of Delegates the bill to abolish slavery in that State was ordered to its third reading.

Southern.—A Southern belle, more malignant than prudent, stepped off the sidewalk the other day in Savannah to avoid going under the national flag. Gen. Geary ordered her in consequence to parade up and down under the "hated symbol" for an hour, and thus pay toll for her disloyalty.

—— The Philadelphia Press gives on the authority of a gentleman who has lived in that State for the last four years, that Georgia is completely tired of the war.

—— Jeff Davis and Alex. H. Stephens are reconciled, so the Richmond Enquirer says.

—— The Richmond Examiner has a severe article on the delay in paying the rebel soldiers. It says: "Where does all the money go? Why, the members of the administration and all their clerks are regularly paid; the State Department absorbs a great deal, that it may buy gold to pay Jews and Gentiles who are supposed to be doing something in Europe. If a private of company X is constantly told by the Quartermaster that there is no money to pay him, let him be consoled by the thought that the President draws regularly. Congress takes care to be paid 'on the nail.' Mr. Foote has his share to pay his expenses into the enemy's country. Everybody is paid on sight except the soldiers; whatever comes short is put to their account."

—— The Montgomery Appeal accused Gen. Kirby Smith of flat rebellion to the rebel President's authority, he having positively refused to transfer his army from the west side of the Mississpi to the east. Some boldly accuse him of intending to march his troops into the service of the Mexican Emperor.

—— On the evening of the 27th a disastrous fire occurred at Savannah, destroying considerable property, but without loss of life. On the morning of the 28th another broke out destroying two squares in the Third District. Several buildings were torn down to prevent the spreading of the flames, as the wind was blowing strong from the east. Lieut. T. J. Spencer, Depot Ordnance Officer, reports that some fiend had placed a keg of powder at the side of the Arsenal, corner of York and Walker streets, undoubtedly to blow up the city, as the place contained over 30 tons of powder. The keg was placed in the shadow of a tree, with the top taken out. A single spark would have carried out this wicked design. It is thought to have been the work of rebels, who are in anything but an amiable mood in view of their present condition.

—— Nearly all the Southern theatres are under the management of ladies. The Richmond theatre is managed by Ida Vernon; that at Wilmington by Eloise Bridges: that at Macon by Miss Virginia Kemble; and that at Mobile by Miss Ella Wren.

Western.—Col. Wolford, of Kentucky, was arrested in compliance with a telegram from Lieut.-Gen. Grant, for making speeches, charged to be of an insurrectionary character and discouraging enlistments. Subsequently he pledged himself to refrain from opposition to the Government, and thereupon was released. In Nov. last Lieut.-Gov. Jacobs was arrested by order of Gen. Burbridge, and banished South for making public speeches, calculated, and apparently intended to weaken the efforts of the Government.

Military.—Col. G. R. Latham, 6th West Virginia Cavalry, has been dismissed the service for not putting the post of New Creek, West Virginia, in a proper state of defence; in consequence of which it was captured with the entire garrison by the enemy.

—— The military authorities in Missouri have ordered that the wives and children of all rebels shall be compelled to leave the State.

—— The Secretary of War has communicated to the Senate a list of officers of the regular army. The general officers are given in the following order: Lieut.-Gen. Grant; Maj.-Gens. H. W. Halleck, Wm. T. Sherman, George G. Meade, Philip H. Sheridan, George H. Thomas; Brig.-Gens. Irvin McDowell, William S. Rosecrans, Philip St. George Cooke, John Pope, Joseph Hooker, and Whitfield S. Hancock.

—— Gen. Meade has been confirmed as Major-General in the Regular Army, his commission dating from the 18th of August last.

Personal.—James Wadsworth, youngest son of the late Gen. Wadsworth, has accepted a position on Major-Gen. Warren's staff.

—— John Steel died the other day, in Philadelphia, from the kick of a horse. He was the wealthiest man in Pennsylvania. Income, $3,000 a day from oil.

—— Frezzolini is singing at the Italian Opera in Paris.

—— That popular favorite Madame La Grange is about to revisit this country.

—— Mr. Charles, of Pittsfield, lately celebrated his silver wedding at an expense of $20,000.

—— Mr. Barnum has paid Miss Laura Keene the sum of $1,000 for a new drama, which she has written for him. It will be soon brought out at the Museum, and will be the dramatic sensation of the season.

—— A son of Dr. Livingstone, the African traveller, who enlisted in the Federal service when the war broke out, was, in the latter part of last year, taken prisoner by the Confederates.

—— Dr. Baikie, whose name is so intimately associated with the efforts which have been made to explore the Niger, died of fever and dysentery, at Sierre Leone, on the 30th of November last.

—— Mr. Elihu Burritt (generally known as the "learned blacksmith,") has been appointed United States Consul at Birmingham.

—— Seth Adams, against whom Mr. Millspaugh recently obtained a verdict for $10,000, for running away with his wife, has declared himself unable to satisfy a judgment of $427, his only property being a few articles of jewellery.

Obituary.—Henry L. Bowen, Postmaster of Providence, R. I., during the administration of Taylor and Fillmore, and author of a biography of Tristram Burgess, died recently.

—— Robert A. West, for many years one of the editors of the Commercial Advertiser of this city, and lately connected with Forney's Washington Chronicle, died in that city on the 1st February.

—— Hon. Joseph Cunard died in Liverpool lately. He was one of the proprietors of the famous line of Cunard steamers. He was in his 67th year.

—— In Paris lately died the well-known writer, Pierre Joseph Proudhon, the author of the notorious saying, "All property is theft!" He was born in Besançon, July 15, 1809. He has spent his life in writing paradoxical pamphlets and editing ephemeral newspapers. In 1849 he was condemned to three years' imprisonment for illegal publications. He was an industrious, able man, either very much in advance of his age or else very mad. These two opinions are held by his friends and opponents.

Accidents and Offences.—Mary Harris, a native of Iowa, shot Burroughs, a clerk in the Treasury, at Washington, on the 30th Jan., for breach of promise of marriage, and was lodged in jail.

—— A gang of burglars, who have for the past two years been committing depredations in Westchester county, has been lately broken up, and the most of the party arrested by Detective Thomas Slowey of the Metropolitan Police and Officer Montgomery of the above county.

—— Peter J. Brown, of Lynn, Mass., was shot, a few days ago, by a young lady, who had received attentions from him, and had afterwards been cast off. He was severely but probably not fatally injured.

Foreign.—The Royal Geographical Society of London has voted $500 towards the $1,000 required by Sir Henry James for the settlement of the level of the Dead Sea.

—— The manufacture of the great Atlantic telegraph cable is progressing very satisfactorily. The length made now averages 80 miles per week. As it is necessary that the cable should be kept constantly immersed in water, eight large tanks have been constructed to contain it, from which it will be coiled into the Great Eastern. The entire cable will be ready by June next.

—— There had been a great snowstorm in Madrid, much to the dismay of the superstitious people of that city.

—— On the 15th of December Donna Leopoldina, the second Princess of Brazil, was married to the Prince August de Saxe Coburg Gotha, son of Prince August Louis Victor of Saxe Coburg Gotha and of Clementine d'Orleans, daughter of the late Louis Philippe, ex-King of the French. The young princess is the second daughter of the Emperor of Brazil, who has now two grandsons of Louis Philippe sons-in-law. The Count d'Eu, son of the Duke de Nemours, married the elder, or imperial princess, on the 14th of last October.

—— At Compeigne, where the French Court is now residing, great efforts are made by a few of the guests to have something startlingly novel, something quite different from what everybody else wears. The last toilet which produced this much-desired sensation deserves a description: It was made of two skirts of white tulle; the upper one was draped, and both were elaborately ornamented with puffings of tulle and satin, trimmed with an infinite quantity of small larks' heads, the beaks of which were used for fastening down the tulle and satin puffings. The head-dress consisted of a spray of diamonds and a lark. We have heard of lark pies, but never before of dresses trimmed with larks. But birds of all descriptions are fashionable; the most tasteful head-dresses are made in Paris of peacocks' feathers, ravens' wings and magpies' tails.

—— The Pope's encyclical letter has only pleased one power, Austria, for even Spain and Bavaria regret it. In France and Italy it has been denounced with great spirit. In Russia it has met with the most bitter spirit, for even that barbarous power says that it is an attack upon truth and right.

—— The scientific world of Paris are much occupied by the experiments which M. Graof intends making, of flying from the towers of Notre Dame by his new machine. He undertakes to remain suspended in the air with as much ease as a bird.

—— Such is the demand for Lord Derby's translation of Homer that the publisher has the greatest trouble to supply the booksellers.

—— A young woman of London has been transported for hocussing and then robbing young men. She had trapped a young midshipman into marrying her, while he was under the influence of drugged liquor.

—— Prince Napoleon has been designated by the Emperor, with the consent of the Empress, to be Regent of France, should he die during the minority of the Prince Imperial. This has given great offence to the Catholics, as the prince is known to be a bitter enemy of the Papal party.

—— Capt. Corbett, who commanded the pirate ship Sea King, now the Shenandoah, has been admitted to bail to take his trial for enlisting sailors to war against the United States.

—— The official Globe denies the report that either gunboats or troops will be sent to Canada.

Art, Science and Literature.—At a recent meeting of the Academy of Sciences, at Paris, a note was read from Mdme. Lapeyrouse communicating the remarkable fact that silkworms which have been fed with leaves of an ungrafted mulberry tree produce finer silk in larger quantity than those which have been reared with leaves of a grafted tree.

—— The model of a new electro-magnetic locomotive is now exhibiting at Versailles, France. Its inventors, MM. Bellet and Rouvre, assert that locomotives constructed on their principle could travel on ordinary railroads at the rate of 124 miles an hour! The power is obtained by magnetising and demagnetising by means of a current supplied by a fixed battery, and, it is said, utilises only a small part of the force developed.

—— A pneumatic loom is at work in London. It is driven by the action of compressed air. We are informed that in the old loom the average rate of speed is 180 strokes (representing the passage of the shuttle across the weft of the fabric on the loom) per minute; and that, by the new process, 60 more strokes may be attained. This invention promises to be of national importance.

—— M. Cauderay, an engineer of Lausanne, Switzerland, has applied the galvanic battery to the sharpening of needles and pins, by connecting a bundle of wires with the negative pole in a most ingenious manner. The process is said to be cheaper than the present method, which is also very injurious to the health of the work-people, in consequence of the fine metallic dust disengaged.

—— A new comet was discovered on the 29th ult. by Prof. Respigbi, of Bologna, Italy, in the constellation of Aquila.

—— The Imperial Library at Paris contains 2,000,000 printed works, 200,000 manuscripts, 3,000,000 engravings, and above 500,000 maps, plans and views.

—— A fisherman recently hauled up a silver fork, marked "Atlantic," near the spot in Long Island Sound where the steamer Atlantic was wrecked on Nov. 27, 1846. It is described as a very heavy, old-fashioned silver fork, bearing marks of long immersion in water.

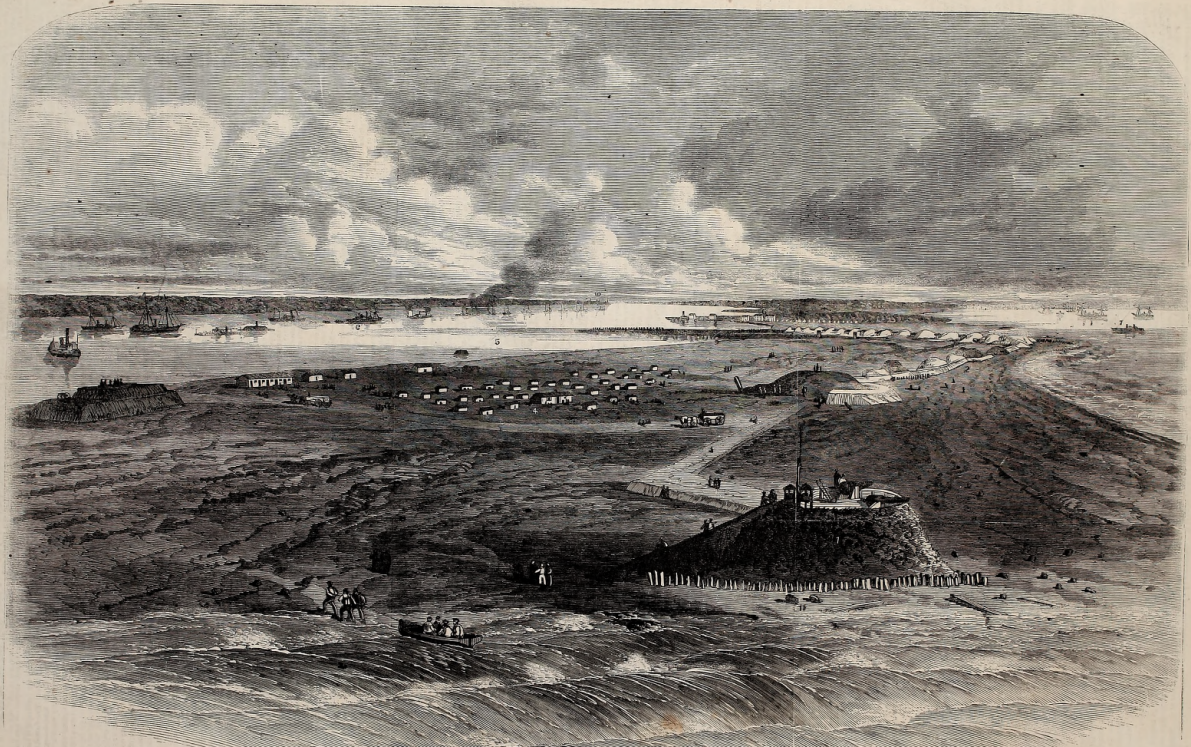
Chit-Chat.—An innocent old lady, who never before had "rid on a railroad," was passenger on one of the Vermont railroads at the time of a recent collision, when a freight train collided with a passenger train, smashing one of the cars, killing several passengers, and upsetting things generally. As soon as he could recover his scattered senses, the conductor went in search of the venerable dame, whom he found sitting solitary and alone in the car (the other passengers having sought terra firma) with a very placid expression upon her countenance, notwithstanding she had made a complete somersault over the seat in front, and her bandbox and bundle had gone unceremoniously down the passage way. "Are you hurt?" inquired the conductor. "Hurt, why?" said the old lady. "We have just been run into by a freight train, two or three passengers have been killed, and several others severely injured." "La me! I didn't know but that was the way you always stopped."

—— A person who signs himself "Jones" asks the New York Evening Post whether, if Admiral Porter makes many more reports about the Fort Fisher business, he might not be called Admiral Reporter?

—— An "intelligent Frenchman" is about to open a cooking academy in New York, where a course of 20 lessons will turn out professional cooks armed with diplomas, to bake, boil, roast and stew. The exercises of this culinary academy are so arranged that mistresses and servants come on alternate days—provided the former are ambitious to learn the secrets of the kitchen.

—— In an article in the United States Service Magazine the following hard-tack story is told: "It appears the boxes in which the 'tack' is packed always bear the brand of the baker or maker, and a lot which arrived in the camp of the 5th New York Excelsiors, with the mark 'B. C., 603,' caused much speculation among the 'boys' as to what it meant. It was finally agreed unanimously that it must be the date when the crackers were made—603 years before Christ."

—— A young lady was recently cured of palpitation of the heart, by a young doctor, in the most natural way imaginable. He held one of her hands in his, put his arm round her waist, and whispered something in her left ear.



—— An Austrian officer has lately died who has left his estate to his nephew on condition that he shall never read a newspaper. To secure compliance with this wish he left large legacies to three of his friends, whom he charges to keep strict watch over his nephew by turns. In the event of his infringing the prohibition he will be immediately deprived of his estates.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine for February is fully equal to any former number of that standard monthly. The fashions department, familiarly known as the "Gazette of Fashion," is the most complete and elegant compendium of information on that subject ever offered to the ladies.—Bridgeport (Ct.) Daily Farmer.

The Human Hair.—The ordinary length of the hair of the head in woman varies from 20 to 36 inches, in some instances longer even than that, but they are of unusual occurrence; its weight from five to eight ounces. A contemporary relates an instance where the hair on a lady's head attained the measurement of six feet in length; and quotes, as an admirable simile, the hair of the lady to which the poet refers when he relates how:

"Like her, to whom at dead of night,
The bridegroom, with his locks of light
Came in the flush of love and pride,
And scaled the terrace of his bride.
When, as she saw him rashly spring,
And midway up in danger cling,
She threw him down her long black hair,
Exclaiming, breathless, 'There, love, there.'"

But its proper length for texture and strength should not exceed 24 inches, and its value as long hair is much depreciated in price when it falls shorter. It has been calculated by Withof that the beard grows at the rate of a line and a half per week, which gives a length of six inches and a half in the course of the year, while for a man 80 years of age 27 feet would have fallen before the razor. We are informed that the beard of Burgomaster Hans Steinengen was so long that upon one occasion, having forgotten to fold up the same, he trod upon it as he ascended to the Council Chamber of Brunn, and was thereby thrown down and killed. And still further we may cite from Eble, that at the Prince's Court at Eidam there is a full-length painting of a carpenter whose beard was nine feet long, so that when engaged at work he was obliged to carry it in a bag. In the British Industrial Exhibition of 1862 there were exhibited specimens of human hair taken from the heads of English, French and Italian ladies; the longest specimen having been cut from an Englishwoman. It was a lock of jet black hair, and measured 74 inches in length!

CLOSE UP.

BY CHARLES GATES

"Close up!" it was the sole command
The leader uttered then;
"Close up!" the sword dropped from his hand,
"Close up!—oh, God!—my men;
Close up!" he waved them off, and on,
And never spoke again.

The two words won; they were the sign
By which each living force
Bears down on every rampart-line
That stands before its course,
And conquers; words are very strong
When Death is at their source.

"Close up!" the growths of Nature press
To each in close embrace,
Does blighting chance make one the less
Another fills its place,
And Nature keeps the triumph-smile
For ever on her face.

"Close up!" no gap the stricken veer
Leaves in the front of Time—
The ages close for ever near
Along their march sublime,
And failure on Time's pages is
A yet unwritten crime.

"Close up!" the conquering mandate by Humanity is given;
Right's battle fails not though men die,
The hosts of Wrong are driven;
And earth shall yet with victor souls
Be populous as heaven.

Nature and Time, Humanity
Unto that leader gave
The two words of their hate's cry
That never have failed to save—
And fitly shaped his closing lips
For victory and the grave.

The Fate of the Forrests.

PART II.

Ten nine days' wonder at the sudden wedding which followed that strange betrothal had died away, the honeymoon was over, and the bridal pair were alone together in their new home. Ursula stood at the window looking out, with eyes as wistful as a caged bird's, upon the fading leaves that fluttered in the autumn wind. Her husband lay on his couch, apparently absorbed in a vellum-covered volume, the cabalistic characters of which were far easier to decipher than the sweet, wan face he was studying covertly. The silence which filled the room was broken by a long sigh of pain as the book fell from Stahts's hand, and his head peaned wearily upon the pillow. Ursula heard the sigh, and, like a softly moving shadow, glided to his side, poured wine from an antique flask, and kneeling, held it to his lips. He drank thirstily, but the cordial seemed to impart neither strength nor comfort, for he drew his wife's head down beside him, saying:

"Kiss me, Ursula; I am so faint and cold, nothing seems to warm my blood, and my body freezes, while my heart burns with a never-dying fire."

With a meek obedience that robbed the act of all tenderness, she touched her ruddy lips to the paler ones that ardently returned the pressure, yet found no satisfaction there. Leaning upon his arm, he held her to him with a fierce fondness, in strange contrast to his feeble frame, saying earnestly:

THE MYSTERY REVEALED.

"Ursula, before I married you I found such strength and solace, such warmth and happiness in your presence, that I coveted you as a precious healing for my broken health. Then I loved you, forgetful of self—loved you as you never will be loved again, and thanked heaven that my fate was so interwoven with your own, that the utterance of a word secured my life's desire. But now, when I have made you wholly mine, and hope to bask in the sunshine of your beauty, youth and womanhood, I find a cold, still creature in my arms, and no spark of the fire that consumes me ever warms the image of my love. Must it be so? Can I never see you what you were again?"

"Never!" she answered, leaning there as pale and passive as if she were in truth a marble woman. "I vowed obedience at the altar, nothing more. I did not love you; I could not honor you, but I felt that I might learn to obey. I have done so, be content."

"No! I! Colder women have been taught love as well as obedience; you, too, shall be a docile pupil, and one day give freely what I sue for now. Other men who before them wed, my wooing and my winning will come later—if I live long enough."

He turned her face towards him as he spoke and scanned it closely; but no grateful sign of softness, pity or regret appeared, and, with a broken exclamation, he put her from him, locked both hands across his eyes and lay silent, till some uncontrollable paroxysm of emotion had passed by. Presently he spoke, and the words betrayed what the pain had been.

"My mother—heaven bless her for her tenderness—used to pray that her boy's life might be a long and happy one; it is a bitter thing to feel that the only woman now left me to love prays for the shortening of that same life, and can bestow no look or word to make its failing hours happy."

The mournful tone of filial affection, the keen sorrow and the mournful acknowledgment of an inevitable doom touched Ursula as no anger or monstration or passionate reproach had ever done. She softly lifted up the folded hands, saw that those deep eyes were wet with tears, and in that pallid countenance read the melancholy record of a life burdened with a sad heritage of pain, thwarted by unhappy love and darkened by allegiance to a superstitious vow. Great as her sacrifice had been, deep as the wound still was, and heavily as her captivity weighed on her proud heart, it was still womanly, generous and gentle; and, despite all wrongs, all blemishes, all bitter memories, she felt the fascination of this wild and wayward nature, as she had never done before, and yielded to its persuasive potency. Laying her cool hand on his hot forehead, she leaned over him, saying, with an accent of compassion sweeter to his ear than her most perfect song:

"No, Felix, I pray no prayers that heaven would refuse to grant. I only ask patience for myself, a serener spirit for you, and God's blessing upon Evan, wherever he may be."

Before the words of tender satisfaction which rose to Stähl's lips could be uttered, a noiseless servant brought a black-edged card. Ursula read and handed it to her husband.

"Mrs. Heath. Shall we see her, love?" he asked.

"As you please," was the docile answer, though an expression of mingled pain and sorrow passed across her face in speaking.

He half frowned at her meekness, then smiled and bade the man deny them, adding, as he left the room,

"I am too well content with this first glimpse of the coming happiness to be saddened by the lamentations of that poor lady over her wilful daughter, who had the bad taste to drown herself upon our wedding-day."

"Felix, may I ask you a question?"

"Anything of me, Ursula."

"Tell me what you whispered in Kate's ear on the evening which both of us remember well."

Questions were so rare, and proving a sign of interest, that Stähl made haste to answer, with a curious blending of disdain and pity,

"She bade me tell her the most ardent desire of her life, and I dared to answer truly, 'To win my heart.'"

"A true answer, but a cruel one," Ursula said.

"That cruel truthfulness is one of the savage attributes which two generations of civilization cannot entirely subdue in my race. Those who tamely submit to me I despise, but those who oppose me I first conquer and then faithfully love."

"Had you made poor Kate happy, you would not now regret the possession of a cold, untender wife."

"Who would gather a gay tulip when they can reach a royal rose, though thorns tear the hand that seizes it? For even when it fades its perfume lingers, gifting it with an enduring charm. Love, I have found my rose, so let the tulip fade——"

There he paused abruptly in his flowery speech, for with the swift instinct of a temperament like his, he was instantly conscious of the fact when her thoughts wandered, and a glance showed him that, though her attitude was unaltered, she was listening intently. A far-off bell had rung, the tones of a man's voice sounded from below, and the footsteps of an approaching servant grew audible. Stähl recognised the voice, fancied that Ursula did also, and assured himself of it by an unsuspected test that took the form of a caress. Passing his arm about her waist, his hand lay lightly above her heart, and as her cousin's name was announced he felt the sudden bound that glad heart gave, and counted the rapid throbs that sent the color to her cheeks and made her lips tremble. A black frown lowered on his forehead, and his eyes glittered ominously for an instant, but both betrayals were unseen, and nothing marred the gracious sweetness of his voice.

"Of course you will see your cousin, Ursula. I shall greet him in passing, and return when you have enjoyed each other alone."

"Alone!" she echoed, with a distrustful look at him, an anxious one about the room, as if no place seemed safe or sacred in that house where she was both mistress and slave.

He understood the glance, and answered with one so reproachful that she blushed for the ungenerous suspicion, as he said, with haughty emphasis:

"Yes, Ursula, alone. Whatever evil names I may deserve, those of spy and eavesdropper cannot be applied to me; and though my wife can neither love nor honor me, I will prove that she may trust me."

With that he left her, and meeting Evan just without, offered his hand frankly, and gave his welcome with a cordial grace that was irresistible. Evan could not refuse the hand, for on it shone a little ring which Ursula once wore, and yielding to the impulse awakened by that mute reminder of her, he betrayed exactly what his host desired to know, for instantaneous as was both recognition and submission, Stähl's quick eye divined the cause.

"Come often to us, Evan; forget the past, and remember only that through Ursula we are kindred now. She is waiting for you; go to her and remain as long as you incline, sure of a hearty welcome from both host and hostess."

Then he passed on, and Evan hurried to his cousin, eager, yet reluctant to meet her, lest in her face he should read some deeper mystery or greater change than he last saw there. She came to meet him smiling and serene, for whatever gust of joy or sorrow had swept over her, no trace of it remained; yet, when he took her in his arms there broke from him the involuntary exclamation:

"Is this my cousin Ursula?"

"Yes, truly. Am I then so altered?"

"This is a reflection of what you were; that of what you are. Look, and tell me if I have not cause for wonder."

She did look as he drew a miniature from his bosom and led her to the mirror. The contrast was startling even to herself, for the painted face glowed with rosy bloom, hope shone in the eyes, happiness smiled from the lips, while youthful purity and peace crowned the fair forehead with enchanting grace. The living face was already wan and thin, many tears had robbed the cheeks of color, sleepless nights had dimmed the lustre of the eyes, much secret suffering and strife had hardened the soft curves of the mouth and deepened the lines upon the brow. Even among the dark waves of her hair silver threads shone here and there, unhidden, perhaps unknown; and over the whole woman a subtle blight had fallen, more tragical than death. Silently she compared the two reflections, for the first time realising all that she had lost, yet as she returned the miniature she only said, with pathetic patience:

"I am not what I was, but my heart remains unchanged, believe that, Evan."

"I do. Tell me, Ursula, are you happy now?"

Her eyes rose to his, and over her whole face there shone the sudden magic of a glow warmer and brighter than a smile.

"I am supremely happy now."

It was impossible to doubt her truth, however past facts or present appearances might seem to belie it, and Evan was forced to believe, despite his disappointment.

"He is kind to you, Ursula? You suffer no neglect, no tyranny nor wrong from this strange man?" he asked, still haunted by vague doubts.

She waved her hand about the lovely room, delicately dainty as a bride's bower should be, and answered, with real feeling:

"Does this look as if I suffered any neglect or wrong? Every want and whim is seen and gratified before expressed; I go and come unwatched, unquestioned; the winds of heaven are not allowed to visit me too roughly, and as for kindness, look there and see a proof of it."

She pointed to the garden where her husband walked alone, never quitting the wide terrace just below her window, though the sunshine that he loved had faded from the spot, and the autumn winds he dreaded blew gustily about him. He never lifted up his eyes, nor paused, nor changed his thoughtful attitude, but patiently paced to and fro, a mute reproach for Ursula's unjust suspicion.

"How frail he looks; if life with you cannot revive him he must be past hope."

Evan spoke involuntarily, and Ursula's hand half checked the words upon his lips; but neither looked the other in the face, and neither owned, even to themselves, how strong a hidden wish had grown.

"He will live because he resolves to live, for that frail body holds the most indomitable spirit I have ever known. But let me tell you why he lingers where every breath brings pain," said Ursula, and having told him, she added:

"Is not that both a generous and a gentle rebuke for an unkind doubt?"

"It is either a most exquisite piece of loverlike devotion or of consummate art. I think it is the latter, for he knows you well, and repays great sacrifices by graceful small ones, which touch and charm your woman's heart."

"You wrong him, Evan, and aversion blinds you to the better traits I have learned to see. An all absorbing love ennobles the most sinful man, and makes it possible for some woman to forgive and cling to him."

"I have no right to ask, but the strange spirit that has taken possession of you baffles and disquiets me past endurance. Tell me, Ursula, what you would not tell before, do you truly, tenderly love this man whom you have married?"

The question was uttered with an earnestness so solemn that it forced a truthful answer, and she looked up at him with the old frankness unobscured by any cloud, as she replied:

"But for one thing I should long ago have learned to love him. I know this, because even now I cannot wholly close my heart against the ardent affection that patiently appeals to it."

"And that one thing, that cursed mystery which has wrecked two lives, when am I to know it, Ursula?"

"Never till I lie on my deathbed, and not even then, unless——"

She caught back the words hovering on her lips, but her eye glanced furtively upon the solitary figure pacing there below, and Evan impetuously finished the broken sentence:

"Unless he is already dead—let it be so; I shall wait and yet prove his prophecy a false one by winning and wearing you when his baleful love is powerless."

"He is my husband, Evan, remember that. Now come with me, I am going to him, for he must not shiver there when I can give him the warmth his tropical nature loves."

But Evan would not go, and soon left her plunged in a new sea of anxious conjectures, doubts and dreads. Stähl awaited his wife's approach, saying within himself as he watched her coming under the gold and scarlet arches of the leafy walk, with unwonted elasticity in her step, color on her cheeks and smiles upon her lips:

"Good! I have found the spell that turns my snow image into flesh and blood; I will use it and enjoy the summer of her presence while I may."

He did use it, but so warily and well that though Ursula and Evan were dimly conscious of some unseen yet controlling hand that ruled their intercourse and shaped events, they found it hard to believe that studious invalid possessed and used such power. Evan came daily, and daily Ursula regained some of her lost energy and bloom, till an almost preternatural beauty replaced the pale loveliness her face had worn, and she seemed to glow and brighten with an inward fire, like some brilliant flower that held the fervor of a summer in its heart and gave it out again in one fair, fragrant hour.

Like a watchful shadow Evan haunted his cousin, conscious that they were drifting down a troubled stream without a pilot, yet feeling powerless to guide or govern his own life, so inextricably was it bound up in Ursula's. He saw that the vigor and vitality his presence gave her was absorbed by her husband, to whom she was a more potent stimulant than rare winds, balmy airs or costly drugs. He knew that the stronger nature subdued the weaker, and the failing life sustained itself by draining the essence of that other life, which, but for some sinister cross of fate, would have been an ever springing fountain of joy to a more generous and healthful heart.

The blind world applauded Felix Stähl's success, and envied him the splendid wife in whose affluent gifts of fortune, mind and person he seemed to revel with luxurious delight. It could not see the secret bitterness that poisoned peace; could not guess the unavailing effort, unappeased desire and fading hope that each day brought him; nor fathom the despair that filled his soul as he saw and felt the unmistakable tokens of his coming fate in hollow temples, wasting flesh and a mortal weariness that knew no rest; a despair rendered doubly bitter by the knowledge of his impotence to prevent another from reaping what he had sown with painful care.

Ursula's hard won submission deserted her when Evan came, for in reanimating the statue Stähl soon felt that he had lost his slave and found a master. The heart which had seemed slowly yielding to his efforts closed against him in the very hour of fancied conquest. No more meek services, no more pity shown in spite of pride, no more docile obedience to commands that wore the guise of entreaties. The captive spirit woke and beat against its bars, passionately striving to be free, though not a cry escaped its lips. Very soon her recovered gaiety departed, and her life became a vain effort to forget, for like all impetuous natures she sought oblivion in excitement and hurried from one scene of pleasure to another, finding rest and happiness in none. Her husband went with her everywhere, recklessly squandering the strength she gave him in a like fruitless quest, till sharply checked by warnings which could no longer be neglected.

One night in early spring when winter gaieties were drawing to a close, Ursula came down to him shining in festival array, with the evening fever already burning in her cheeks, the expectant glitter already kindling in her eyes, and every charm heightened with that skill which in womanly women is second nature. Not for his pride or pleasure had she made herself so fair, he knew that well, and the thought lent its melancholy to the tone in which he said:

"Ursula, I am ready, but so unutterably weak and weary that I cannot go."

"I can go without you. Be so good," and quite unmoved by the suffering that rarely found expression, she held her hand to him that he might clasp her glove. He rose to perform the little service with that courtesy which never failed him, asking, as he bent above the hand with trembling fingers and painful breath,

"Does Evan go with you?"

"Yes, he never fails me, he has neither weakness nor weariness to mar my pleasure or to thwart my will."

"Truly a tender and a wifely answer."

"I am not tender nor wifely; why assume the virtues which I never shall possess? They were not set down in the bond; that I fulfilled to the letter when I married you, and beyond the wearing of your name and ring I owe you nothing. Do I?"

"Yes, a little gratitude for the sincerity that placed a doomed life in your keeping; a little respect for the faith I have kept unbroken through all temptations; a little compassion for a malady that but for you would make my life a burden I would gladly lay down."

Time was when words like these would have touched and softened her, but not now, for she had reached the climax of her suffering, the extent of her endurance, and turning on him she gave vent to the passionate emotion which could no longer be restrained:

"I should have given you much gratitude if in helping me to save one life you had not doomed another. I should honestly respect the faith you boast of if such costly sacrifices were not demanded for its keeping. I should deeply pity that mortal malady if you had bravely borne it alone instead of seeking a selfish solace in bequeathing it to another. I tell you, Felix, you are killing me swiftly and surely by this dreadful life. Better end me at once than drive me mad, or leave me a strong soul prisoned in a feeble body like yourself."

For the first time in his life Stahl felt the touch of fear, not for himself but for her, lest that terrible affliction which so baffles human skill and science should fall upon the woman whom he loved with a selfish intensity which had tangled two lives and brought them to this pass.

"Hush, Ursula," he said, soothingly, "have patience, I shall soon be gone, and then—what will you do then?"

The question leaped to his lips, for at the word "gone" he saw the gloom lift from her face, leaving an expression of relief that unmistakably betrayed how heavily her burden had oppressed her. Undaunted by the almost fierce inquiry she fixed her eyes upon him, and answered steadily:

"I shall put off my bridal white, wear widow's weeds for a single year, and then"—there she, too, paused abruptly; but words were needless, for as Evan's step sounded on the stair she turned and hurried towards him, as if love, liberty and life all lay waiting for her there. Stähl watched them with a jealous pang that pierced the deeper as, remembering Ursula's taunt, he compared the young man with himself; the one rich in the stature, vigor, comeliness that make a manly man; the other, in sad truth, a strong spirit imprisoned in a ruined body. As he looked he clenched his pale hand hard, and muttered low between his set teeth:

"He shall not have her, if I sell my soul to thwart him!"

To Ursula's intense surprise and Evan's annoyance Stähl followed them into the carriage, with a brief apology for his seeming caprice. No one spoke during the short drive, but as they came into the brilliant rooms Ursula's surprise deepened to alarm, for in the utter change of mien and manner which had befallen her husband she divined the presence of some newborn purpose, and trembled for the issue. Usually he played the distasteful part of invalid with a grace and skill which made the undisguisable fact a passport to the sympathy and admiration of both men and women. But that night no vigorous young man bore himself more debonnairly, danced more indefatigably, or devoted himself more charmingly to the service of matron, maid and grateful hostess. Lost in amazement, Ursula and Evan watched him, gliding to and fro, vivacious, blithe and bland, leaving a trail of witty, wise or honied words behind him, and causing many glances of approval to follow that singular countenance, for now its accustomed pallor was replaced by a color no art could counterfeit, and the mysterious eyes burned with a fire that fixed and fascinated other eyes.

"What does it mean, Evan?" whispered Ursula, standing apart with her faithful shadow.

"Mischief, if I read it rightly," was the anxious answer, and at that moment, just before them, the object of their thoughts was accosted by a jovial gentleman, who exclaimed:

"God bless me, Stähl! Rumor said you were dying, like a liar as she is, and here I find you looking more like a bridegroom than when I left you at the altar six months ago."

"For once rumor tells the truth, Coventry. I am dying, but one may make their exit gracefully and end their tragedy or comedy with a grateful bow! I have had a generous share of pleasure; I thank the world for it; I make my adieu to-night, and tranquilly go home to rest."

Spoken with an untroubled smile the words were both touching and impressive, and the friendly Coventry was obliged to clear his voice before he could answer with an assumption of cheery unbelief:

"Not yet, my dear fellow, not yet; we cannot spare you this forty years, and with such a wife what right have you to talk of ending the happy drama which all predict your life will be?" then glad to change the subject, he added: "Apropos of predictions, do take pity on my curiosity and tell me if it is true that you entertained a party with some very remarkable prophecies, or something of that sort, just before your marriage with Miss Forrest. Hay once spoke mysteriously of it, but he went to the bad so soon after that I never made him satisfy me."

"I did comply with a lady's wish, but entertainment was not the result. I told Hay, what all the world knew, the next day, that certain dishonorable transactions of his were discovered, and warrants out for his arrest, and they hurried home to find my warning true."

"Yes, no one dreamed of such an end for the gay captain. I don't ask how your discovery was made, but I do venture to inquire if Miss Heath's tragical death was foretold that night?"

"That which indirectly caused her death was made known to her that night, but for her sake you will pardon me that I keep the secret."

"A thousand pardons for asking, and yet I am tempted to put one more question. You look propitious, so pray tell me if your other predictions were fulfilled with equal success?"

"Yes; sooner or later they always are."

"Upon my life, that's very singular! Just for the amusement of the thing make one now, and let me see if your skill remains undiminished. Nothing personal, you know, but some general prediction that any one may know and verify."

Stähl paused a moment, bending his eyes on Ursula, who stood unseen by his companion, then answered slowly with a memorable tone and aspect:

"I prophesy that before the month is out the city will be startled by a murder, and the culprit will elude justice by death."

Coventry's florid countenance paled visibly, and hastily returning thanks for the undesirable favor so complacently granted, he took himself away to whisper the evil portent in the ears of all he met. As he disappeared Stähl advanced to his wife, asking with an air of soft solicitude:

"Are you weary, love? or will you dance? Your cousin is negligent to-night."

"Oh, no, I have not wished to dance. Let us go now, and Evan, come to me to-morrow evening, when you will find a few friends and much music," she answered, with an unquiet glance at her husband, a significant one at her cousin, who obeyed it by leaving them with a silent bow.

The homeward drive was as quiet as the other had been, and when they alighted Stähl followed his wife into the drawing-room; there, dropping wearily into a seat, he removed the handkerchief which had been pressed to his lips, and she saw that it was steeped in blood.

"Pardon me—it was unavoidable. Please ring for Marjory," he said, feebly.

Ursula neither spoke nor stirred, but stood regarding him with an expression which alarmed him, it was so full of a strange, stern triumph. It gave him strength to touch the bell, and when the faithful old woman who had nursed him from his babyhood came hurrying in, to say quietly:

"Take that ugly thing away, and bring my drops; also your mistress's vinaigrette, she needs it."

"Not she, the icicle," muttered Marjory, who adored her master, and heartily disliked her mistress because she did not do likewise.

When the momentary faintness had cleared away Stähl's quick eye at once took in the scene before him. Marjory was carefully preparing the draught, and Ursula stood watching her with curious intentness.

"What is that?" she asked, as the old woman put down the tiny vial, containing a colorless and scentless liquid.

"Poison, madam, one drop of which will restore life, while a dozen will bring a sure and sudden death.'

Ursula took up the little vial, read the label containing both the medicine and its maker's name, and said it back again with a slight motion of head and lips, as if she gave a mute assent to some secret suggestion. Majory's lamentations as she moved about him drew the wife's eyes to her husband, and meeting his she asked coldly:

"Can I help you?"

"Thanks, Majory will tend me. Good-night, you'll not be troubled with me long."

"No, I shall not; I have borne enough."

She spoke low to herself, but both listener heard her; and she so keenly smarted under it.

"May the Lord forgive you for that speech, madam."

"He will, for He sees me in my penitence and the guilty, and He knows my sore temptation."

Then without another look or word she left them with the aspect of one rushing in an evil dream.

All night Majory hovered about her master, and early in the morning his physician came. A few words answered Stahl that his hour was drawing very near, and that whatever work remained to be done must be accomplished speedily. He listened calmly to the truth which he had forced from the reluctant doctor, and when he paused made no lament, but said, with more than his accustomed gentleness:

"You will oblige me by concealing this fact from my wife. It is best to let it break upon her by merciful degrees."

"I understand, sir, I will be dumb; but I must caution you to be on the alert or agitate yourself in heat, for any undue exertion or excitement would be fatal in your weak state."

The worthy doctor spoke earnestly, but to his infinite amazement and alarm his patient rose suddenly from the couch on which he lay half dressed, and standing erect before him, said forcibly, while his hollow cheeks burned crimson, and his commanding eye almost enforced belief in his assertion:

"You are mistaken; I am not weak, for I have done with fear as well as hope, and if I choose to batter my mouth of ills for one hour, one moment of exertion or excitement, I have the right to do it."

He paused, took breath and added:

"My mind intended to receive her friends tonight; she must not be disappointed, therefore you will not only tell her I am in no danger, but add that an unexpected pause in my malady has come, and that with care and a season at the South I shall yet be a hale and hearty man. Grant me this favor, I shall ask forget it."

The doctor was both a poor and a timid man; his generous but eccentric patient was a fortune to him; his threatened removal a loss, and a hint of a rich remembrance was irresistible, and bowing his acquiescence, he departed to obey directions to the letter.

All that day Ursula sat in her room writing steadily, and all that day her husband watched and waited for her coming, but was not summoned and received no message. At dusk she went out alone. Her departure was unheard and unseen by any but the invalid, whose every sense was alert; his quick ear caught the soft rustle of her dress as she passed his door, and dragging himself to the window he saw her glide away, veiled in a shrouding cloak. At that sight Stahl's hand was lifted to the bell, but he dropped it, saying to himself:

"No, if she did not mean to return she would have taken care to tell me she was coming back; women and Majory themselves by long use lie art. I have it! she has been writing, Majory says; the letter is to Evan; she fears he may not come to-night, and cannot so one but herself to post it. I must assure myself of this."

Nerved with new strength, he went down into the dusky room so happily prepared with all suited to Ursula's sole use. It was empty, but the charm of her presence lingered there, and every graceful object spoke of her. Lights burned on all the writing-table; the ink was still wet in the pen, and scattered papers confirmed the report of her day's employment, but no certain words could he see, no note or packet anywhere appeared. A brief survey satisfied her husband, and ensured him of the truth of his suspicions.

"Oh, for an hour of my old strength to end this entanglement like a man, instead of being forced to wait for the usual chances to aid the like a censorious woman," he sighed, looking out into the wild March night, tormented by an impotent desire to follow his truant wife, yet consoling himself it was impossible unless he left a greater work undone, for hourly he felt his power decline, and one dark purpose grew him tenacious of the life fast slipping from his hold.

For many moments he stood thinking deeply, so deeply that the approach of a light, rapid step roused him too late for escape. It was his wife's step; why was she returning so soon? had her heart failed her, had some unforeseen circumstance thwarted her? She had not been absent long enough to post a letter to reach Evan's lodgings, or the home of any friend, then where had she been? An uncontrollable impulse caused Stahl to step noiselessly into the shadow of a curtained recess as these thoughts flashed through his mind, and hardly had he done so when Ursula hurried in, wet, wild-eyed and breathless, but wearing a look of pale determination which gave place to an expression of keen anxiety as she glanced about the room in search of something. Presently she murmured aloud, "He shall never see it again that I do not trust his honor. Lie there in safety till I need you, little friend," and lifting the cover of a carved ivory casket that ornamented the low chimneypiece, she gave some treasure to its keeping, saying, as she turned away with an air of feverish excitement, "Now for Evan and—my liberty!"

Nothing stirred in the room but the flicker of the fire and the softly moving pendulum of the clock that pointed to the hour of seven, till the door of Ursula's distant dressing-room closed behind her and a bell had summoned her maid. Then, from the recess, Stahl went straight to the ivory ornament and laid his hand upon its lid, yet paused long before he lifted it. The simple fact of her entire trust in him at any other time would have been the earnest safeguard of her secret; even now it restrained him by appealing to that inconsistent code of honor which governs many a man who would shoot his dearest friend for a hot word, and yet shrink with punctilious pride from breaking the seal of any letter that did not bear his name. Stahl hesitated till her last words rang through his memory, making his own perfidy seem slight compared to hers. "I have a right to know," he said, "for when she forgets her honor I must preserve mine at any cost." A rapid glance uncovered the contents, and showed him nothing but a small, sealed bottle, lying alone upon the velvet lining. A harmless little thing it looked, yet Stahl's face whitened terribly, and he staggered to a seat, as if the glance he gave had shown him his own death-warrant. He believed it was, for a size, shape, label and colorless contents the little vial was the counterpart of another last seen in Ursula's hand, one reference only in the terms that had been nearly empty, the wife fell to the lip.

In an instant her look, tone, gesture of the preceding night returned to him, and with the vivid recollection came the firm conviction that Ursula had yielded to a black temptation, and in her own hands was laid poison, the means of her death. Till now no feeling but the intensest love had filled his heart towards her; Evan he had learned to hate, himself to despise, but his wife he had made an idol and worshipped her with a blind passion that would not see defects, even disloyalty or suspect deceit.

From any other human being the treachery would not have been so base, but from her it was doubly heinous, for she was the keeper of his knowledge of his exceeding love. "Am I not dying fast enough for her impatience? Could she not wait a little, and let me go hence as I had appeared?" he cried within himself, forgetting in the anguish of that moment the falsehood told her at his bedside, for the deception for a pure purpose as sinful but less sense than her own. How time passed he no longer knew nor cared, as leaning his head upon his hands, he sat like one with his own unquiet heart, for all the evil passions, the savage impulses of his nature were aroused, and married rebellion against the fate of the feeble prison that confined them. Like all strong, yet selfish souls, the wrongs he had committed looked to him very trivial compared with this, and seeing only his own devotion, faith and patience, no vengeance seemed too heavy for a crime that would darken and destroy the purpose of his life. Suddenly he lifted up his head, and on his face was stamped a ruthless, reckless purpose, which no earthly power could turn or stay. An awesome smile touched his white lips, and the ominous fierceness glittered in his eye—for he was betaking to a devil that sat whispering in his heart.

"I shall have my hour of excitement sooner than I thought," he muttered, as he rose; he left the room, carrying the vial with him. "My last prediction will be verified, although the veiling and the subject are changed. I wish I could live to wish that Ursula had died before me."

An hour later Ursula came to him as he sat solemnly leaning on the mantel, and Majory stood tempting him to taste the cordial she had brought. As if more impossible and unseen abyss already opened between them, he saw him his mother wifely caress nor evening greeting, but passing opposite, said, with an inclination of her handsome head, which seemed a mockery of haughty courtesy but for the gentle coldness of her tone:

"I have obeyed the request you sent me, and made ready to receive the friends whose coming would else have been delayed. Is it your pleasure that I excuse you at any hour you will join us, or have you leave often seen other invalids would fain to leave their beds?"

Her husband looked at her as she spoke, wondering what woman's whim had led her to assume a dress rich in itself, but tasteless and sombre as a mourning garb, and whether darkness relieved only by the gleam of fair arms through folds of costly lace, and a knot of roses, scarcely whiter than the bosom they adorned.

"Thanks for your compliance, Ursula. I will come down later in the evening for a moment to receive your friends, and then you can excuse me."

"No, now, for now I can wish you a long and happy life, and leave her lips, that would fain learn a truer faith, and ask you to forgive me if in thought, or word, or deed I have wronged or offended you."

Strangely sweet and solemn was her voice, and for the first time in many months her old smile parted her lips, and sent a softer light into her eyes; it with a meeker beauty than that which it had lost. Her husband shot one glance at her as the words left her lips, then veiled the eyes that blazed with sudden scorn and detestation. His voice was always under his control, and tranquilly he answered her, while his heart cried out within him:

"I forgive as I would be forgiven, and trust that the coming years may prove to you that I desire to save them. Go to your pleasures, Ursula, and let me hear you singing, whether I am there or no."

"Can I do nothing else for you, Felix, before I go?" she asked, pausing, as she turned away, as if some involuntary impulse ruled her.

Stahl smiled a strange smile as he said, pointing to the goblet and the minute bottle Majory had just placed on the table at his side:

"You shall sweeten a bitter draught for me by mixing it, and I will drink to you when I take it by-and-by."

His eye was on her now, keen, cold and steadfast, as she drew near to serve him. He saw the trouble look she fixed upon the cup, he saw her hand tremble as she poured one soft drop, and heard a double meaning in her words:

"This is the first. I hope it may be the last time that I shall need to pour this dangerous draught for you."

She laid down the nearly emptied vial, replaced the cup and bowed over it to go. But as if about to trying her to the utmost, though each test tortured him, Stahl arrested her by saying, with the same sweetness in his voice, a rebellious tenderness in his eyes:

"Stay, Ursula, I may fall asleep and so not see you until—morning. Bid me good-night, my wife."

She went to him, as if even against her will, and for a moment they stood face to face, looking their last on one another in this life. Then Stahl clasped her to him with an embrace almost savage in its passionate fervor, and Ursula kissed him once with the cold lips, that said, without a smile, "Good-night, my husband, sleep in peace!"

"May I ask you to remember, sir?"

"Concerning what or whom, my old gossip?" he answered, tartlessly, yet with even more than usual fickleness, for in his humble, faithful creature seemed his only friend.

"My mistress, sir," she said, nodding significantly.

His face woke then, he set erect, and with an eager gesture bade her speak.

"I've been thinking that her for ever since her cousin came she has not been the women or the wife she was at first. It's not for me to meddle, but it's a pity to see that if you were gone there'd be a wedding soon."

Stahl frowned, eyed her keenly, seemed to catch some lingering hope in the honest countenance, and answered, with a pensive smile:

"I know it, I forgive it; and am sure that, for my sake, you will be kind and true to others. In this what you wished to tell me, Majory?"

"Bless your unsuspecting heart, I wish it was, but it's a deal more than that if you were gone there'd be a wedding soon."

Stahl frowned, eyed her keenly, seemed to catch some lingering hope in the honest countenance, and answered, with a pensive smile:

"I know it, I forgive it; and am sure that, for my sake, you will be kind and true to others. In this what you wished to tell me, Majory?"

"Bless your unsuspecting heart, I wish it was, but it's a deal more than that if you were gone there'd be a wedding soon."

Stahl answered, but refused to give vent to some sudden passion, but repressed it, and with a look of well-feigned wonder, asked:

"Why should she?"

Majory pointed silently to the table, upon which lay three objects, the cup, the little vial and a note that had fallen from the latter as she was bent to render her husband the small service he had asked of her. There was no time to feign horror, grief or dismay, for the paroxysm of pain seized him in its grips, and served him better than any counterfeit of mental suffering could have done. Majory saw in the power of an unforgivable spirit that would not yield yet, and laying his thin hand on Majory's arm, he whispered, hastily:

"Hush! Never hint that again, I charge you. I bade her get it, my store was nearly gone, and I needed it almost as much as I do now."

The old woman read his answer as he meant she should, and laid her withered cheek down on his hand, saying, with a sob in her voice:

"Always so loving, generous and faithful! You may forgive her, but I never can."

Neither spoke for several minutes, then Stahl said:

"I will lie down and try to rest a little before I go."

The sentence remained unfinished, as, with a weary yet wistful air, he glanced about the shadowy room, and then added, "Let me be alone for hour off the sudden influence of some deeper sentiment than fear that for an instant thrilled and startled him.

"Leave me, Majory, set the door ajar, and let me be alone until I ring."

Side by side, hour by hour he lay listening to the steps of gathering guests, the sound of music, the soft murmur of conversation, and the pleasant hum of life in the house that was his home, but of which he was a stranger. There in the very splendor of his power, with its sinless lids, its damp forehead and its pale lips, scorned parted by the faithful breath, he lay in the shadow, divided from the room again, unconscious that its closed eyes flashed wide to watch her go.

Presently the door of the garden hush, and borne on the wings of an entrancing air Ursula's voice came floating up to him, like the sweet, soft whisper of some invisible spirit, an enchanter him to a sad life noble by one just and generous action ere it close. No look, no tone, no deed of patience, fondness or devotion was forgotten by a heart bent him now, and pleaded for her with the magic of that unconscious lay. No ardent hope, no fair ambition, no happy vow of his youth, but rose again to show the utter failure of his manhood, and in the hour darkened by a last temptation and brooding over the fruitless past, he felt a firmer faith than that which superstition had defrauded of its virtue. Like many another man, for one short hour Felix Stahl contended for a heaven and evil, and like so many a man in whom passion ordinary principle, evil won. As the magical music ceased, a man's voice took up the strain, a voice mellow, strong and clear, singing as if the exultant song were but the outpouring of a hopeful happy heart. Like some wild creature wounded suddenly, Stahl leaped from his couch and stood listening with an aspect which would have appalled the fair musician had she seen the singer during.

"She might have spared me that!" he panted, as through the heavy beating of his heart he heard the voice he hated lending music to the song he loved, a song of lovers parting; in the summer night, whose dawn would break upon their wedding-day. Whatever hope of merciful relenting might have been kindled by one redeeming prayer was for ever quenched by that ill-timed air, for with a gesture of defiant daring, Stahl drew the cup to his hand, heard its contents into the cup, and drained it to the dregs.

A long shudder crept over him as he set it down, then a pale, serene, almost beautiful look, as, laying his weary head upon the pillow it would never rind sleepless any more, he pressed the rose against his lips, and with a bitter smile that never left his face again:

"I won my rose, and her thorns have pierced me to the heart. I will not lay blighted as her, and no other man will wear her in his bosom when I am gone."

THE POTATO IN PERU.

We conclude our extracts from Mr. E. G. Squier's instructive address before the Farmers' Club of the American Institute, the following, concerning the potatoes of Peru, and the mode of preserving them:

The potato is more neat than any other article of food in Peru, where, as it is well known, it is indigenous. It is not extensively cultivated on the coast but on the first range of ridges inland it grows in great perfection. Here, however, in the Lake country, a yellow potato, which is unsurpassed for richness and delicacy, is found. It is grown in the Lomas at 10 degrees of Lima, and does not appear to bear transportation to the coast well. It requires, in fact, the full degree of moisture into the ordinary potato if planted on the coast or has a higher up the mountains.

High up in the Cordilleras of the Andes, the potato is found, with the exception, the chief crop of the people. Here however it is small, and presents several rather remarkable varieties, which I have described from the Mesa. The Urbeo is small, seldom larger than a hickory nut, and of a dark watery color, and of a sweet taste. Its leaf is like that of the potato, but smaller and finer. The stem is also shaped somewhat differently and subject to ferment. The Oca (oxalis tuberosa) is also cultivated extensively. It resembles somewhat a fleshy Finger," potato, seldom more than four inches long, and little if any larger than the middle finger. Its is generally a beautiful clear pink, darker in the eyes and sometimes nearly white. It is of a sweetish juicy taste. Like the others just mentioned, it is sweeter when exposed to the sun when boiled or roasted. The Ulluco, Mesa and Oca are almost always subjected to the process of exposure to the sun at night and sun by day, before eaten. The Oca by the time it becomes ready, and the Ulluco and Mesa slightly so, thus which it possesses when freshly taken from the ground. The Mesa is the largest of the three, is round and cried, and the sun in a cool place for years. The Ulluco is long, and may be preserved for years.

The common form in which the potato is used or offered for sale in the elevated departments of Peru, is that of Chuno. This, as well as the Moraya in high Bolivia, is that of Chuno. The Cuzco sayes, or Indian Corn, is made of the ordinary white potato, boiled, the skin thence, or white, chalky, of a larger size than the ordinary potato, and somewhat lighter. The potatoes are exposed on a smooth place to the night frosts, and during the day are generally covered on clothe spread on the ground, and allowed to freeze at night and thaw by day, for a week or more, being frequently turned, until they become perfectly dry. They are then packed in sacks, and are ready for use or exportation. Many reach the towns and cities of Peru in this form, and are used in soups and in a mountainside drench or stew called chupe. In taste the chuno, when well prepared, is like the boiled Spanish chestnut. To the teeth its feel is like what I suppose that of the dried salted codfish to be. The chuno and moraya are sometimes soaked in water for some days before being used, in order to remove the bitterness, and making the potato the preservation is to boil it, peel it, and lay it out in the sun to dry. The chuno is found to be the longer preserve form of the potato, for as long as the flour of the potato is preserved and kept for use of transportation, a matter of importance in thousand mountain regions. The moraya is made the vegetable mealy and more easy of use. Foreigners generally prefer especially the latter form, and prefer it to the potato in its other forms. Perhaps the moraya is the most delicious form known to fresh, may take a hint from the Peruvian practice, and learn how to preserve the potato crop. They will, however, hardly find the clear frosty nights of the Andes and the rarefied atmosphere of the Altos of Peru to assist them in the process.

HOW THE LADIES OF SAVANNAH DRESS.—A correspondent writes from Savannah: "The Southern people have been greatly pinched of late by the war; but the ingenuity of the people of Savannah defies the truth of the assertion. 'What is the news North?' I was asked by an officer to whom I had just been introduced. 'How do you like Savannah?' I replied, 'But I am not a citizen of Savannah?' 'Looked at your boots,' was the response. 'Look at the ladies' dresses.' And in a cash myself glancing at the footgear of citizens I met, I found the remark to believe the definition. In the sense of the children this speculation is useless, for they are generally barefooted, with the exception of the ladies have gone far back into classical wardrobes for their costumes. They affect black dresses. Your wear bids write folded ribbons, or bonnets of the antique Grecian design. Some of the girls go to high by their own hair and everybody else's they can lay hands on. The Southern spirited manufacturers say they should ask a lady of Savannah if she were 'under and if she would not reply that she was in mourning, she not demanded. It's insinuated that it has become necessary for the ladies to dress in order to be known apart by them the Yankees as nameless as the Southern gentlemen are known to them as Secessionists. Dressing in the plainness of their dress, suggestive here and there by a little ribbon turned, and, in fact, by almost whatever touch of coquetry their reduced circumstances will allow, they manage to look as pretty as ever. Their air is marred by extreme dejection—not defiance. Evidently, regarding the Yankees as the victors, and being beside our private enemies in their own power, and their own country, they have not the slightest notion of pride of resignation. Absit that American woman should ever come to be in such a drop so fraught with assessment and self-accusation."

COLORS.—Colors have emblems as well as flowers. In ancient days each color was a symbol of mystic sense. White was the emblem of light, religious purity, innocence, virginity, faith, hope and life; a dove a bright radiant white was in his rich man, humility; in the woman, chastity. Red, the fiery, active color, signifies love, joy, life, power, and royalty. White and red roses expressed love and virtue, or love and wisdom. Red is in garments with which the angels crowned St. Cecilia. In a bad sense, red signifies blood, war, hatred and punishment. Red and black combined were the colors of purgatory and the devil. Blue, or the sapphire, expressed heaven, the firmament, truth, constancy, fidelity. Yellow, or gold, was the symbol of the sun, or intuition, of marriage faith, of fruitfulness. In a bad sense, yellow signifies inconstancy, jealousy, deceit. Green, the emerald, is the color of spring; of virtue, of hope. Purple, or hyacinthine, is the color of victory, as the color of the palm and the laurel. Violet, the amethyst, signified love and wrath, or passion and suffering.

EXCITING SCENE IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JAN. 31, 1865, ON THE ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE PASSAGE OF THE AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION ABOLISHING SLAVERY FOR EVER.

FAULTLESS VERSES.

MR. RUSKIN, in his recent "Readings" in London, gave specimens of almost every style of writing, but as a contrast to what he called "sensation writing," gave the following inimitably exquisite verses of Tom Hood's:

"We watched her breathing through the night,
Her breathing soft and low,
As in her breast the wave of life
Went heaving to and fro.

"Our hopes belied us as we wept,
Our fears our hopes belied;
We thought her dying when she slept,
And sleeping when she died.

"But when the morn came dim and sad,
And soft with airy showers,
Her quiet eyelids closed—she had Another morn than ours."

If we were called upon to supply a pendant to poetry so perfect, we would instance the following, lately written by Tennyson in a similar vein:

"Fair is her cottage in its place,
Where yon broad water sweetly slowly glides,
It sees itself from thatch to base,
Dream in the sliding tides.

"And fairer she—but ah! how soon to die!
Her quiet dream of life this hour may cease,
Her peaceful being slowly passes by
To some more perfect peace."

ONLY A CLOD.

CHAPTER XI.—CONTINUED.

Once more Mrs. Burfield stopped to take breath. Francis Tredethlyn listened in silence, with a moody frown upon his face. Already he hated this man, of whose share in his cousin's history he was yet ignorant. He felt as we feel sometimes at a play, when we see the villain first appear upon the stage, and know he is a villain, yet do not know what his special crime is to be.

"Well, sir, of all the pleasant lodgers that ever darkened a widow's doors, the plucked young gentleman was the pleasantest. He got up early, and went to his books and papers as soon as he was dressed, and had chops and strong green tea for breakfast; and he sat at his books all day, till it was too dark for him to sit any longer, and then he went and strolled up and down the esplanade, smoking for an hour or so, and then he came in and had more chops, and cold brandy and water, for his dinner, except when I took the liberty of roasting him a fowl, or getting some other little nicety, just by way of variety; and then after dinner, he went to his books and papers again, and sat up till very late, reading and writing and drinking strong green tea."

"But my cousin Susan," cried Francis. He was getting impatient under this minute description of the lodger's habits. "What has all this to do with my cousin?"

"I'm coming to that," Mrs. Burfield answered, with a sigh that was more profound than usual. "You see, sir, it happened at this time, being the end of the season, and Coltonslough as empty as it could be, it happened that we were without a servant, so myself and Susan Turner took it in turns to wait upon the young gentleman. Not that I ever asked her to do anything that you can call menial, but she'd take him up his tea, and clear away his dinner-things, and light his candles for him, and such like; and knowing her to be a respectable young woman, I didn't keep that sharp watch over her that some folks might have done. If she stopped ten minutes or so in his room, talking to him, I usen't to think anything about it—you can hear almost every sound in these houses, and it was quite pleasant to hear her soft voice and his laugh ringing out every now and then. He wasn't the sort of gentleman you could suspect of any harm, he had such a happy kind of way with him, as if he was good friends with himself and all the world. He lent Susan books—books of poetry, with all sorts of pencil-writing upon the edges of them; and I used sometimes to fancy Susan cared more for the pencil-writing than she did for the poetry itself, she'd sit and pore over it so when the children were gone to bed, and we were alone in this room. Sometimes the plucked young gentleman would come down here of an evening to fetch himself another candle, or to tell us that he'd let his fire out, or something of that kind, for he wasn't a bit proud; and then, instead of going back directly, he'd sit down, and make himself as much at home as if he had lived among us all his life; and, oh dear me, sir, how he would talk!—all about books and poetry, and the foreign places he'd seen, and plays, and music, and writers, and actors, and singers. He seemed to know everything in the world. So you see, one way and another, he saw good deal of Susan, for I found out afterwards, from the children, that he when went out in the dusk to smoke his cigar he generally contrived to meet Susan, and then he'd walk with her and the children till it was time for them to go indoors. She was a good girl, and she wasn't the girl to throw herself in his way. If they were much together it was because he followed her. I might have known the meaning of his sitting in this room for hours together of a night, but he had such a natural way of doing everything that it threw one off one's guard, somehow."

"The scoundrel!" muttered Francis Tredethlyn, between his clenched teeth. "But you haven't told me his name. I want to know his name."

"He'd been with us more than a fortnight before ever I asked him what his name was, and then somehow or other the question came up, and he said his name was Lesley—Robert Lesley; but somehow, looking back upon it afterwards, it seemed to me as if he hesitated a little before he said the name. Well, things went on as comfortable as possible for more than two months, and then he went away, taking all his luggage with him, and paying me very liberal for everything he'd had, besides half a crown apiece to the children, which at that time of year came very welcome, and of course I took it from them immediately to go towards their new boots. He went away; and as I thought, somehow, he'd had a kind of a liking for Susan, and Susan for him, I half expected the poor girl would fret a little when he was gone; but she didn't, and looking at her sometimes as she sat at work opposite to me, I used to fancy there was a kind of happy smile like upon her face. She'd been with me six months by this time, and I paid her the little trifle that was due, and what did she do next day but go out and spend ever so much in toys and such like for the children, which, as I told her, was very wrong, considering how badly off she was for clothes. But she made no answer, except to look at me with the same smile I'd seen so often on her face since Mr. Lesley had gone."

"Poor girl—poor, helpless, innocent girl!"

The dark frown melted into a softer expression as Francis Tredethlyn muttered these few broken words. He was no longer thinking of the stranger—the nameless villain of this common story. He was thinking of his cousin Susy's innocent face, with the smile of girlish trustfulness upon it.

"One day, when Mr. Lesley had been gone a little better than three weeks, a letter came for Susan—I'd need to notice it, for it was the first she'd had since she'd been with me. She ran upstairs directly she heard the postman's knock, and took the letter from him with her own hands, and stopped to read it in the passage. She was putting it in her pocket as she came back into this room, and her cheeks were flushed as bright as two red roses, but she didn't say a word about the letter. All that afternoon she seemed in a kind of flutter, and every now and then she would come all over in a tremble, and drop her work in her lap. She was making some pinafores for the boys, and I said to her, 'Susan, what ever is the matter?' But she turned it off somehow, and nothing more was said until after tea, when the children were safe out of the way, and we were sitting alone together. Then I never did see anybody so restless as she was, laying her work down and taking it up again, and fetching a book—one of the books he'd left with her—and opening and shutting it, and then pretending to read, but all in the same restless way, till at last she came suddenly behind my chair and flung her arms round my neck, and began to sob fit to break her poor loving heart. And it was ever so long before she could get calm enough to say anything; but at last she cried out, 'Oh, Mrs. Burfield, I'm afraid I'm very ungrateful; you've been so good to me, and we've been so happy together.' And so we had, though I do think, poor tender-hearted dear, she'd gone through as much on account of the taxes as if she'd been the householder instead of me. 'I'm going to leave you, Mrs. Burfield,' she said; 'I'm going to leave you and the children that love me so dearly. I'm going away to be married to Mr. Lesley. I'm to go by the first train to-morrow morning, and he's to meet me at the station, and at eleven o'clock we're to be married.'

"You may guess how she took my breath away when she told me this. But I said, 'Oh, my dear, you can't mean to do anything so mad as to go alone to meet Mr. Lesley, which is little better than a stranger to you?' 'A stranger!' she cried out, 'my darling Robert a stranger! Oh, if you only knew how noble he is, and how much he is going to give up to marry a poor girl like me.' And then she went on about him as if he'd been something better than a human creature; and having always found him so much the gentleman myself, and so open-hearted and frank in all his ways, I could scarcely do otherwise than believe her. But still I urged her all I could against trusting him. 'Don't go, my dear,' I said, 'or if you must go, let me go with you.' But she blushed very red, and said, 'Oh, Mrs. Burfield, the marriage is to be a secret, and I promised Robert again and again that I wouldn't say a word about it to you or any living creature. Only you've been so good to me, and I couldn't bear to go away without telling you the whole truth.' And upon this I begged her still harder not to go away; I told her no good ever came out of secret marriages, and that there was generally something underhand and false at the bottom of them that brought about all kinds of trouble and suffering afterwards. And I told her how my Burfield married me publicly in St. Pancras' church, and would have his two sisters—one in pink and one in blue—besides the Miss Parkinses, his first cousins, who were sweetly dressed in green and salmon, to walk after me to the altar. But it was no more use talking to Susan than if she'd been a stone statue, though she sat herself on the little hassock at my feet, and kept crying one minute and smiling the next, and talking about her darling Robert, and kissing me, till I almost thought her brain was turned. It was no use talking. 'I love him so dearly,' she said, 'and I know how noble and generous he is.' And that was her only argument; and long before daylight the next morning she went away by the early train; and though my heart seemed bleeding for her, I couldn't kiss her when she said good-bye, and I couldn't go to the station to see her off. 'No, Susan,' I said, 'if you must go, you must, and I've no power to keep you back, but I'll be neither act nor part in your going.' But I stood at my window to see her go away, and I shall never forget the dark, drizzly morning, with streaks of gray like on one side of the sky, and white, sickly-looking stars on the other, and Susan walking across the waste ground all alone, with the rain driving at her, and the wind beating at her, and a bit of a shabby carpet-bag in her hand. It seemed so dreadful to think she was going to be married like that."

"But she did go away?" cried Francis. "She must have come back to you then, for the letter with the Coltonslough postmark reached her father less than eighteen months ago."

"I'm coming to that," answered Mrs. Burfield. "It's about eighteen months ago that she came back to me, looking, oh! so changed, so broken down, that I hadn't the heart to ask her any questions. I could see that all had gone wrong, and I could guess pretty well what kind of wrong it was. She never mentioned Mr. Lesley's name; and there was something in her face which seemed to make me afraid to mention it myself. She wanted to lodge with me, she said, and would pay me for her lodgings. I could see that she wore a wedding ring on her finger, but she had no other jewellery whatever. She was dressed in black—black silk that had once been very handsome, but which was rusty and shabby then. The first night she came to me she sat up very late writing, and in the morning she went out with a letter in her hand. She was with me more than two months, but that was the last time I ever saw her write. She used to be fond of reading; but now she never took up a book, though Mr. Lesley had left a good many of his books in the little chiffonier in the parlor, thinking to come back, as he told me. She used to be fond of the children; but now she never noticed them, and after a little while they seemed to shrink away from her, as if she was strange to them somehow. For hours and days together she used to sit in the bow-window, watching the road from the station, as if she expected some one. At dusk she would go out and walk upon the esplanade, just at the time that he used to walk with his cigar. It was the dull season, and there was no one to notice her. At last, about the middle of May, when the visitors began to come to Coltonslough, she told me one day that she must leave me. I said, 'Was it on account of the lodgings?' because she knew I used to raise the rent at that time of year, and I thought that might be the cause of her wanting to go. But she said, 'Oh, no, no.' She had only had one purpose in stopping so long, and that was in the hope of seeing some one, or getting an answer to a letter she had written, and now there was no longer any hope of that. So I couldn't persuade her to stay any longer, do what I would, and she went away. She had friends in London, she told me, who had promised to put her in the way of getting her own living some how or other. I kissed her this time, willing enough, poor child, and I went with her to the station, and I thought her pale face looked almost like a ghost's as she waved her hand to me from the carriage window."

"You're a good woman!" cried Mr. Tredethlyn, half crushing Mrs. Burfield's skinny hand in his strong fingers. "You're a good woman, and you did your best to befriend that poor girl."

Mrs. Burfield sighed, and wiped her eyes with the corner of a rusty black silk apron. The world had been very hard for her; but there was a gentle, womanly haven somewhere in her breast, and Susan Tredethlyn had taken shelter there.

"She'd been gone a little over six weeks, when an old gentleman came one morning, and asked to see a girl called Susan. That's how he put it. He was very stern-looking, and he threw me all in a tremble, somehow, with his ways; but I asked him down here, and then, little by little, he made me tell him pretty nearly all I've told you. I couldn't keep anything back from him; he put his questions so fierce and sudden; and every time I hesitated ever so little, he accused me of prevaricating with him, and trying to deceive him. I could see his eyes glaring at me like coals of fire, and his face turned of a bluish white, so that I was almost frightened he'd drop down in a fit. But when he'd got all the story out of me, he stood up as straight and stern as if he'd been only twenty years old, and said, 'No man of my name ever knew what disgrace was until to-day, and may the heaviest curse that ever fell upon a woman's head come down upon my shameful daughter.' He stretched up his two hands—and I shall never forget him as he stood there with his white hair, and the bluish white of his face, and the dreadful glare in his eyes. Then he put on his hat and walked out of the house, taking no more notice of me than if I'd been a stock or a stone. I heard the front door bang to after him, and I ran upstairs to the parlor window, and saw him walking away towards the station; and that's the last I saw of him."

"Can you remember upon what day this occurred?"

"Yes, I can; for I'd had the parlor lodgers leave me the day before. It was the 29th of June."

The 29th of June! and on the 30th Oliver Tredethlyn had executed that will which made Francis master of thirty thousand a year. The young man knew now why his uncle had left him a great fortune, and found it still more difficult to feel very grateful to his benefactor.

There was a long pause, during which vengeful thoughts had their full way in the breast of Francis Tredethlyn.

"Can you tell me nothing more of this man," he said presently—"this scoundrel, who called himself Robert Lesley?"

Mrs. Burfield only answered by a hopeless shake of her head.

"He left some books, you say. Was there none among them that would give any clue to who or what he was?"

Again Mrs. Burfield shook her head.

"You're welcome to look at the books," she said; "there's plenty of pencil writing in them, but no name or address—only initials."

She knelt down before a little chiffonier, in a corner by the fireplace, and took out a few volumes, some handsomely, some shabbily bound, and placed them before Francis Tredethlyn.

Upon the handsomely-bound books the initials "R. L." appeared in a gilded monogram. Four of the volumes were German translations of some recondite classics; but there was a fifth upon which Mr. Tredethlyn fastened eagerly. It was a small flat volume, bound in sheepskin, and fastened with a brass lock—a very superior kind of lock. On the cover was written the one word—"Journal."

"Let me have this book," he said, "I'll give you a hundred pounds for it."

Mrs. Burfield's mouth opened with a spasmodic action, and for once in her life she forgot to sigh.

"A hundred pounds!"

"A hundred—two, if you like. Haven't I told you that I'm a rich man? and you've been kind to my cousin. I'll give you the money as a free gift, for the matter of that; but I must have this book. It's a journal, a book in which a man writes a history of his own life. An officer I knew in Van Diemen's Land used to write such a history by fits and starts. How do I know what this may tell me about my cousin? Let me have it. I know the book isn't yours; but there can be no such thing as honor or faith to be kept with such a man as that. Let me have the book."

There was a good deal more said upon the matter, but the end of it was that Francis Tredethlyn went back to London with the sheepskin-covered volume in his pocket; and Mrs. Burfield, retiring to rest, after a heavy supper of cold meat and cucumber, dreamt that she had inherited a million of money from one of the Coltonslough tax-collectors.

THE MURDER OF AUNT DEB.

BY THADDEUS B. GLOVER.

AMONG the many peculiar and startling incidents which occurred during my long sojourn in Kentucky, the following is not the most uninteresting.

One evening, while quietly seated under the porch of a friend's house, enjoying the sweets of my corncob pipe, and endeavoring to penetrate through the curls of its smoke when this "cruel war" would be over, we were suddenly startled by the piercing shrieks of female voices. We all jumped to our feet in an instant, and looking up the pike a short distance, we beheld in the soft moonlight several ladies gesticulating and screaming for help in the utmost frenzy. Being probably the most active of the party, I was out the gate and in the midst of the ladies at once. I found that the affrighted party were Mrs. H——, a wealthy widow lady, and her four pretty daughters, who were the next neighbors on the opposite side to my friend.

As soon as I came up they all screamed, as it were with one voice, "Somebody's murdering Aunt Deb!" I knew Aunt Deb was the old colored slave cook of the family, and without further questioning flew towards the house as fast as my legs could carry me, followed by the ladies—my male companions were at this moment far in the rear. As I dashed along the pike I drew my bowieknife—which self-protection bid me carry—and soon reached the mansion. Here I was met by a host of darkeys, big and little, all having terror in its most aggravated shape depicted in their countenances, and in my hurry I thought I saw one darkey look a little pale.

As with the ladies, the blacks cried out with one voice, "Somewun's chokin' Auntie Deb!"

"Where is she?" I eagerly inquired.

"Down dar in de back kitchen," they replied.

"Get a light," said I, and started for the rear of the house.

As I reached the stairway and began to descend, I heard the old wench groaning most agonizingly. I thrust open the door and shouted, "You villain! what are you about here?" at the same time stepping inside; but it was so dark I could not distinguish anything in the room. The old woman kept on her hard breathing, groans, and a sort of gurgling in the throat, and I thought she would be murdered sure enough before they brought the light. So guarding my head as best I could with my left arm, I commenced "sawing the air" with my trusty bowie, and making fearful plunges at immaterial space.

Presently the light came. I nervously clutched it and cast my eyes around the room. There was no one there, but the door was open leading into the front cellar. My friends had by this time arrived—one with a cocked pistol in his hand. I did not hesitate—I made a rush in the cellar. It was filled with piles of wood and coals. An axe lay there. I thought of the strategy of disarming the foe; I seized it. We all then made a general search throughout the premises, but the miscreant was no where to be seen. I was disappointed. Going up to the old woman's bed, which lay in one corner of the room, and she in the middle of it, with her knees drawn up to her chin, and covered up head and ears, I rather abruptly said—

"What the d——l's the matter with you, aunty? Who hurt you?"

She merely groaned out, in a shivering voice—"Under de bed!"

In an instant we were all on our knees hunting among the rubbish for the assassin, but were again disappointed in finding him. Getting up quite out of all patience, I pulled the covering off the old woman's head and said—

"Have you been drinking, Deb, that you have been making all this disturbance?"

The old wench turned over, and rolling up the whites of her great shiny eyes, said—

"No, massa, no, I ain't been a drinkin'; but I 'specks I'se heen doin' a heap o' dreamin'!"

There was a dead silence for about three seconds, when there was one general shout. The gentlemen roared and the ladies screamed, amid which I sheathed my bowieknife and rather unceremoniously sought the fresh air.

A HIBERNIAN Senator, speaking of Suicide, said: "The only way to stop it is to make it a capital offence, punishable by death."

AN OLD STORY.

BY FITZJAMES O'BRIEN.

THE snow falls fast in the silent street,
And the wind is laden with cutting sleet;
And there is a pitiless glare in the sky,
As a fainting woman goes wandering by.

The rags that wrap her wasted form
Are frozen stiff in the perishing storm;
And she is so cold, that the snowflakes rest
Unmelted, upon her marble breast!

Ah! who could believe that those rayless eyes
Were once as sunny as April skies;
And the flowers she plucked in the early spring
Loved to be touched by so pure a thing!

'Tis past—and the fierce wind shrieking by
Drowns the faint gasp of her parting sigh;
And lifeless she falls at the outer gate
Of him who has made her desolate.

Silently falls the snow on her face,
Garbing her form in its stainless grace,
As tho' God, in his mercy, willed that she Should die in a garment of purity!

The Ordeal by Touch.

IN these days, when any man who has a large mouth, and strong legs which he can hurl about in utter independence of each other, and without reference to the parent trunk, and who can ask the very dreariest of riddles, sets up as a negro dancer and singer, with the title of "delineator of the eccentricities of the sable race," there is something unsatisfactory to the few who may be personally acquainted with the habits and idiosyncrasies of the negroes, in seeing so little justice done to our dark brethren, who are usually represented as a nation of black Calibans and Trinculos. Very few of the music hall audiences or of the multitudes who daily and nightly witness what are called "Delineations of Negro Life" are aware to what extent the caricature is pushed, and how considerably they are imposed upon. The negro, pur sang, is strongly romantic and imaginative, and excels even the wild imaginings and picturesque superstitions of the Irish, who are, if we may use the phrase, romantic from the more common and sentimental point of view. The race of negroes is imbued with something of the Arimanic philosophy; they are controlled by a dread of the evil agency of Obeah, and there is a gloominess and cloud of fatalism upon their superstitions (grovelling as they may at first sight appear), which denote minds of a stronger stamp than those of a nation which peoples the hillsides with fairies and "good people." It is not our intention to give undue elevation to the intelligence of the negroes; and perhaps so high a term as "fatalism" may seem out of analogy to the acknowledged ignorance and heavy dulness of the blacks—but the simple type of "fatalism" is precisely the doctrine which would recommend itself to minds which, unable to extend the sphere of thought, are glad to refer events to one ruling agency, and so dispense with the exercise of free-will, in the various developments of which are exhibited the characteristics of nations and individuals. A singular instance of negro romance, from a fatalistic point of view, occurred some years ago in the island of Barbados; and the conduct of the principal performer in the narrative, though founded upon superstition, is not without dignity. When my father purchased the Hope estate in Barbados, he bought, with the stock, fixtures and appertainings of the land, certain slaves attached to the soil, the residue of the late proprietor's establishment, amongst whom was a black of the true African race, who went by the name of Sammy. This man soon became an object of notice, from his exceptional indolence and carelessness of what befell him—he seemed to be so offended in his soul at being degraded first as a slave and then by a transfer which levelled him with the beasts of the field, which were included with him in the purchase of the estate. Be that as it might, work he would not. My father, ever considerate and merciful to his servants, having failed to induce him to join the cropwork with the other gangs, as they are called, proposed, by way of easy labor, that Sammy should "graze a cow" for him; no great risk certainly, but Sammy objected to the responsibility, and declared that he was tired of life, and wanted "to go home." No notice was taken of these expressions at the time, but their solution was to come.

One day, at dawn, a messenger came to my father to apprise him that Sammy was sitting by the Hope well, and that he had declared his intention of jumping down the same as soon as the day was ended. My father immediately rose and went to the well, which, at this time, was dry, but of immense depth, nearly one hundred and fifty feet, and paved at the bottom, in order to hold the rains. Arrived at the spot, he found the negro sitting, as had been described, on the coping of the well, which had been built high, in consideration of the children on the estate. My father spoke to Sammy, and attempted first to laugh and then to reason him out of his projected suicide, but to no purpose, and, worn out, my father was compelled at last to leave him. After breakfast my mother also went to the well. There was now a circle of his friends and acquaintances all adding their requests to his poor wife's lamentations. None, however, durst approach him, for he had arranged a circle of stones at a radius of about six feet from the edge of the well, and with one hand on the coping, and the other extended in warning, he assured them that if they ventured beyond a certain distance, or within this belt, he would at once leap down. When my mother approached, Sammy seemed moved, and said:

"Missy—don't come farther—don't let them say you made me jump down."

After a long and vain effort at persuasion, my mother retired in tears. Others of us, members of the family, now visited him, but all failed to turn him from his purpose.

"No!" said he, decisively, "I am tired of my life—my sun is nearly set"—(I give his very words)—"I am going home!"

Our butler Robert, a mulatto, tried to argue with him, but vainly; finally, the rector of the parish came to use his influence. Sammy listened respectfully, but shook his head at the conclusion of the clergyman's monitions. The sun was now past the meridian, and Sammy's time was drawing nigh. Once more my mother came to him, this time being accompanied by the wretched man's only child. She prayed and besought him to come away.

"No! missy," he said, sorrowfully, "I have lived enough—I am going home."

Large numbers had now encircled the well, awaiting anxiously the setting of the sun. Slowly, and in tears, did the members of our family depart and leave the fated man. With a smile of patient endurance, but with determination unfaltering, he sat watching the descending fire into the sea. Just as the sun in all its tropical splendor sank beneath the horizon, the suicide raised himself, and, pointing towards the west, said:

"And now I'll go and sup with the French King!" and having said this he leaped down.

Here was fatalism combined with romance, and dignified by sternness and composure—a scene never to be forgotten by those who witnessed it. What allusion was intended in the last words of this man, there is no chance of discovering; and perhaps the expression appears at this distance of time rather an anti-climax to the gravity of the scene, which should have been in its catastrophe almost sublime. Truth, however, demands that I should give the very words used.

Another instance which also occurred in the Island of Barbados (a spot replete with legends and anecdotes of the rarest description) exhibits a different phase of the negro mind working in superstition.

Some years ago a gentleman of the name of Elcock resided in Barbados. His gentleness and kindness to his slaves were proverbial, and they were all in appearance deeply attached to him. One negro in particular, who had been selected for his intelligence and readiness as Mr. Elcock's body-servant or valet, was admitted into much of his master's confidence and intimacy, and the pleasant relations between them were well known to all the neighborhood.

On one occasion Mr. Elcock, reflecting that the diligence and affection of his servant might be enhanced by granting his freedom, made out an instrument of manumission by which the man was to be liberated from slavery as soon as he (Mr. Elcock) deceased. He acquainted his valet with his intention, who expressed his joy and gratitude profusely, but seemed a little disappointed at not receiving an immediate freedom. Mr. Elcock explained that the only reason for this postponement of his release was to avoid making an invidious distinction between one of his servants and the rest of the establishment, who were, not unnaturally, a little jealous of the favorite. Matters were thus arranged, and all seemed to go on as before.

One morning, however, one of the servants, coming to Mr. Elcock's room with his early cup of coffee, discovered his master lying across the bed with his throat barbarously cut from ear to ear. Alarm was given, and soon the news spread far and wide that Mr. Elcock had been robbed and murdered by some enemy. The valet, who slept in the next room, and had to be awakened in the morning by the discoverer of the murder, was distracted with grief; he tore his hair, and gave way to extravagant grief, calling on his "his dear master," "his poor, loved master," &c., and vowing vengeance on the assassins. No suspicion of course attached to him, as every one was aware of the intimacy and affection which existed between Mr. Elcock and himself. Unfortunately for him, however, he exaggerated his complaints so transparently, that a gentleman of the inquest, who was well acquainted with the superstitions of the African, determined on a public trial of the servants of the establishment. One by one the slaves were summoned into the room where the murdered man lay blanched, and with all traces of his wounds concealed by the grave-clothes. One of his hands, however, which had suffered in the struggle for life, was left bare, and composed decently on his chest. The slaves passed through the dead man's chamber, some with dread, some in tears, none with indifference. At length came the confidential servant, wringing his hands, and exhibiting excessive grief. The inquisitor bade him go to the corpse and touch his hand. The man smiled and made a ghastly effort to speak, but his lips were white and his face twitching with fear. The juror, with a laughing expression of confidence in his innocence, now seized his hand and approached the body. With a face bedabbled with sweat, and with knees knocking together, the valet neared the corpse; his hand almost touched his master's inanimate fingers, when, with a shriek, he fell on the floor with the horrible confession pouring from his lips. He had been discovered by his fear that the murdered man's blood would flow when the guilty hand touched its victim.

So his superstition convicted him, and by the side of his murdered benefactor he told the hideous story of murder and ingratitude.

A CORRESPONDENT in Michigan, speaking of the late dry summer season, tells us that it was so dry that the farmers on the oak openings were obliged to resort to some other business besides farming for a living. Some two or three have experimented in rosin from the common white pine. The white turpentine is saved and simply boiled down, thereby losing all the oil and spirits of turpentine, but saving the rosin, a sample of which I send. Our farmers think that they can make money at it at one-half present prices ($40 to $50 per barrel). The sample is light colored, clear and free from specks, a very nice article.

TOWN GOSSIP.

RUMORS of peace and opera a reality once more—could anything else be necessary in order to make us happy, excitable Gothamites that we are?

The troupe arrived unharmed from their Boston exile and opened on Thursday evening to a house that in the way of numbers and brilliancy could not easily be surpassed. They gave "Don Sebastiano," and probably from their delight at once more finding themselves in habitable regions, the performers one and all appeared to unusual advantage.

Zucchi continued the triumphs of last season, if possible improving upon her former rendition of the part of Zaida, and Massimiliani has certainly made a very marked progress both in the way of voice and acting. Friday evening they gave us "Fra Diavolo," with charming Miss Kellogg as charming and graceful as ever, in the rôle of Zerlina, which suits her voice so admirably. Since then we have had Il Poliuto, Ernani, Faust, and are promised Le Prophète.

The houses have been crammed nightly—the dress-circle and boxes look like the most gorgeous flower parterres, and in the way of costly and elegant attire New York women seem to have surpassed even the lavish expenditure which long since grew into a proverb.

Some man wrote a pitiful letter to the Evening Post last week begging the editor to give Zucchi a word of advice in regard to her dress in Zaida. He is dreadfully shocked at her oh-no-we-never-mention-thems, and desires that as we do not know the difference between the attire of a Moorish and Turkish female, that she will, for decorum's sake, adopt the loose trowsers supposed to make part of the costume of the latter. Can he be a relative of the Boston lady who thought that a tin petticoat, painted to resemble marble, would render the Venus de Medicis more presentable to eyes refined?

But the most insane thing in the way of a letter that we have encountered for ages, was one written not long since to a daily paper by a man who complains of the inconvenience and risk he runs from riding in public vehicles, because other people will insist on letting down windows and having a little air as fresh as it can be obtained, instead of being content to stay shut up like prisoners in the Black Hole of Calcutta.

Now we never expected to live to hear a complaint of this sort uttered—we had supposed that nothing could ever again make us guilty of the vulgar sensation of astonishment; but we confess that to find a living animal, either biped or quadruped, to whom it is natural to breathe carbonic gas instead of moderately pure oxygen, does somewhat upset our equanimity.

This must be the man whom everybody has been so unfortunate as to meet times enough to peril one's immortal soul, by the objurgations his proceedings force one to utter with frantic energy. He is the man who always has a cold in his head and snuffles incessantly from Bowling Green to Madison Square. He is the man who always finds fault fiercely because children are allowed to beautify cars and omnibuses, like knots of flowers brightening a dusky office. He is the man who always takes more than a double allowance of seat and whom we saw a lady serve very rightly the other day by putting the point of her umbrella so that he dove comfortably against it when he attempted to give her a vicious push. He is the man who forced us out into a pelting rainstorm not long since, because he made the stage a miniature purgatory by howling till everybody was glad to close a window in order to make him quiet.

Why, a wretch like that is worse than a Southern incendiary—what is being burned alive compared to a slow death by suffocation in a self-sealing can? He would probably be perfectly comfortable in a room like the one where an unfortunate Brooklyn family smothered themselves the other night by shutting doors and windows, building a huge fire in one of those contrivances of the fiend called a stove, and leaving the covers off so that the noxious gas could fill the place without the least difficulty. They were seven, like the family in Wordsworth's poem, but at least one or two of the little ones died, and the others had such a feeble hold of life left that it was hardly worth mentioning.

It would be just the place for the detestable creature of whom we write, and if he won't go there let him at once seek out any such as share his monomania and let them all be laid in rows like sardines, in a box hermetically closed, where they shall cease to annoy the human species and may enjoy to the utmost their inglorious affinity.

All sorts of extraordinary things have happened to people this winter who were in search of apartments, but the pleasantest adventure we have heard of occurred to a young friend of ours. The man and woman of the house showed the rooms—first requesting the visitor not to dim the shine of the banisters by touching them as he mounted the stairs. Then they asked his business—told him they objected to their lodgers receiving visits—said the gentleman who occupied the second floor front always took his boots off in the lower hall and carried them up in his hand—that night keys were prohibited—that the smell of smoke made the female faint at once—that a youth who had the third floor back had actually been guilty of the enormity of whistling a few evenings previous, but had apologised properly, saying that it was "purely accidental"—that

But by this time young New York had gained the foot of the staircase, and fled without casting a glance behind. You may laugh and disbelieve, but the thing actually happened without one word of exaggeration.

There is a shoemaker in Broadway who exhibits in his window a diabolical bundle of bones labeled "the human foot;" we never go by without being forced to look at it, and never without new wonder as to why the man should turn his window into an anatomical museum on a small scale.

Does he think that by showing what an unpleasant object the human foot is people will be inclined to rush in and purchase an extra supply of boots, in order to keep the very inhuman thing covered, or has he a fiendish pleasure in making men uneasy when they regard the number and slenderness of the bones, so that for two blocks after they walk as if treading on eggshells, for fear of disturbing in any way the marvelous arrangement—which is it? Now it is a very different thing when that arbiter elegantiarum of fashion, Barker, puts a model lady's head-dress in his window. We have puzzled ourselves with reasons and all in vain, but we do protest against having such a waking nightmare presented to our eyes every time we walk out—why, the effect on nervous people must be equal to that produced by the cook in the wonderful English story. There was a shop renowned for its meat pies, and one fine day, when four and twenty clerks were greedily devouring the tempting circles, up flew the dumb waiter, and instead of a fresh supply of patée out jumped an excited man, crying: "I am Mrs. Burbridge's cook! Gentlemen, these pies you are eating are made of—well, just ask the butcher!" Instantly four and twenty pallid clerks disappear round the corner; lamp-posts and every other available support are in great demand, and the shop is forced to put up its shutters; just what we should like to see the bootmaker obliged to do.

Another thing—when a poor, tired omnibus horse slips and falls upon the icy pavement, could there be no way devised of helping him except for several men to beat and kick him until what strength and breath he had left are tortured out of his wretched carcase? Only yesterday we saw a brute—the name is weak to express his nature—pommeling an unfortunate dray horse that had fallen, hopelessly entangled in the harness, while a crowd, among whom were two policemen, stood evidently admiring the performance of the drunken fiend.

Murdering a man might be pardonable under certain circumstances, but flaying alive here and the torments of an orthodox hot place hereafter would be slight punishment for a biped capable of striking a child or ill-treating a dumb animal.

A lady recently wrote to a prominent bookseller, telling him that she had heard a great deal about a new poem, called "In a Garden," and desired him to send her a copy if he had it; by way of particularizing she added in a postscript: "I believe it is written by one Trembleson."

Whose ingenuity would make out of the above that she meant Enoch Arden? The "one Trembleson" is perfectly delicious, and how jolly it would be to repeat the thing to the immortal Alfred himself.

An article we saw lately, seeming inclined to class in the same category the new sources of fortune, shoddy and petroleum, which have sprung up since the commencement of the war, set us thinking, and it seems to us that nothing can be more unjust than to draw a comparison between the two aristocracies, as they are called in the vulgar cant phrase of the day.

It is true that fortunes are sometimes realised by both with a rapidity which rivals Heller's most wonderful conjuring feat, that both come under the head of speculation, but there all resemblance ceases.

Petroleum is the free gift of prodigal nature—in a company established upon a solid basis there is no possibility of wrong to any—the poor man who embarks his funds is certain of reaping his harvest in a proportion as honest as that of the greatest capitalist concerned.

Petroleum is a trade in the products of nature; shoddy, a traffic in blood—the term sounds harsh, but it is none the less true and well-deserved. The shoddyite must of necessity be a swindler, the very name shows that his is an undertaking based on the grossest fraud and rascality. Every dollar that such a man gains is stolen from the hard earnings of others, from those who deserve the sympathy and respect of their countrymen, the soldiers who are risking their lives for their native land, the men whose blood is red on Southern savannahs, whose brothers lie buried at Ball's Bluff and Fair Oaks—the men who for four years have endured privation and danger, and endured them cheerfully, who gave up quiet, the associations of home, everything that makes life dear, to guard the Union which we all love and venerate.

It is from men like these that the shoddy millionaire has torn his accursed gains. Does it ever occur to him that the costly raiment with which he decorates his wife is a badge of infamy, that ought to wear her down like a traitor's pall? Does he ever think that the pearls which gleam on his daughter's neck are stained with blood, that the choice wines he drinks at his table are the tears of the widows and the orphans whom he has wronged, that the day must come when the soul of a condemned criminal shall show pure and white beside his guilt-stained spirit?

Let us have no more comparisons of this sort let us be thankful that, at the very moment when so much needed, a source of wealth like petroleum has flowed upon our land; and if we cannot check the son of shoddy in his inhuman career, let us at least be silent for very shame, remembering that even a jest upon its workings is like a scoff over the graves of the brave warriors whom we profess to lament.

Among the pleasant things of the future is the second annual ball of the Italian Benevolent Society, ticketed for Irving Hall, Friday evening, February 10th, the proceeds of which will be devoted to the Italian Evening School, under the patronage of the municipality, and the orphans of volunteers in the army. The Italian school, although organised no longer ago than November, numbers upwards of 40 pupils, under the general direction of Prof. A. Magni. The English class is taught by Prof. Simona, the common branches by Mr. Peretti, and drawing by Mr. D. Gandie. The advancement of this school, in which instruction is gratuitously offered to Italian youth, is an object of public interest, and we hope the proposed ball will turn out to be the great success it deserves to be, if only for the sake of the good and laudable objects to which its proceeds will be devoted. It will be remembered that the Italian Benevolent Society last summer gave a concert for the benefit of the Sanitary Commission, under the direction of the able and distinguished Signor Barili, well known as the maestro under whose instruction no less than two prima donnas were fitted for their profession, Morensi and Mrs. Van Zandt. Signor Barili is ever ready to dedicate his talents and services to the promotion of worthy objects. The Italians have thus formed a direct claim on American sympathies, which we doubt not will be reciprocated now that an opportunity is offered.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

A SAW-FILER in New Bedford, whose practice is quite extensive in doctoring dull saws, puts out a sign in the form of a handsaw with the words "saw-dentist" painted on it.

A GOOD guess at a tailor's name—Mr. So-and-so.

A GENTLEMAN, unluckily the victim of intoxication, came home late, and was reproached by his wife.

"A pretty time this, sir," she said, "for a father to come home to his family—three o'clock in the morning."

"Three!" replied the injured inebriate, "it's only one; I heard it strike one, two or three times, as I came round the corner."

JUDGE RICHARDSON once said that "everything was foreknown by the Almighty, except what would be the verdict of a petit jury."

AH! sighed Waifer, what a sublime and petrolemic study is ciphering—when he learned that the compound interest of one cent from the beginning of the world to this day would equal in value 4,840,000,000 globes of solid gold, each as big as the earth. Save your pennies, little boys."

DR. MEAD was once assailed in a pamphlet by Dr. Woodward. The Doctors met—a fight ensued with swords. Mead disarming his adversary, ordered him to beg for his life.

"Never!" said Woodward—"never till I am your patient."

SOMEBODY, describing the awkward appearance of a man dancing the polka, says that "he looks as though he had a hole in his pocket, and was trying to shake a shilling down the leg of his trowsers."

STRIKES have been numerous in all branches of business during the past year; but the only successful ones have been among those who have "struck ile."

MISS EDGEWORTH wrote a witty essay on Irish bulls, in which she defends the Irish from the charge of being prone to bull-making. She herself, however, appears to have fallen into the practice, which is very contagious, in the following passage in the life of her father:

"The last letter poor Johnson ever wrote, or, I should rather say, dictated, was to my father; it was in his nephew's handwriting."

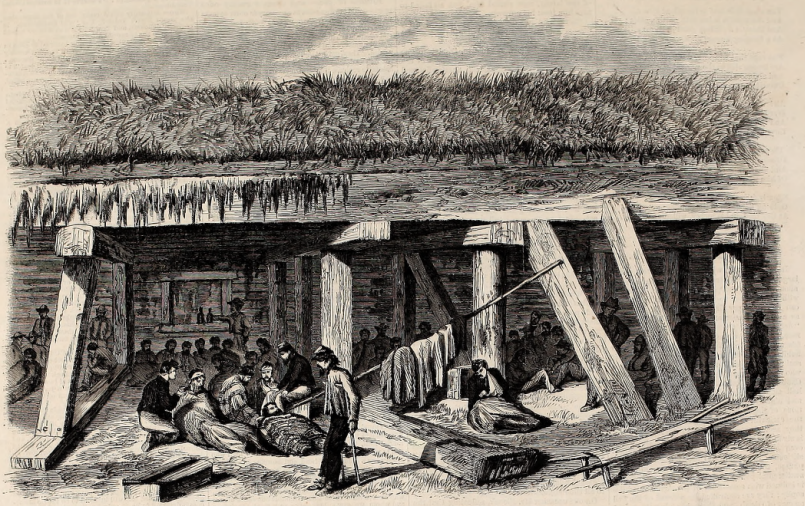
A TEACHER in a western county in Canada, while making his first visit to his "constituents," got into conversation with an ancient "Varmount" lady, who had taken up her residence in the "backwoods." Of course, the school and former teacher came in for criticism; and the old lady, in speaking of his predecessor, asked:

"Wa'al, master, what do you think he larnt the schollards?"

"Couldn't say, ma'am. Pray what did he teach?"

"Wa'al, he told 'em that this 'ere airth was round, and went around; and all that sort o' thing. Now, master, what do you think about sich stuff? Don't you think he was an ignorant feller?"

Unwilling to come under the category of the ignorami, the teacher evasively remarked:



"It really did seem strange; but still there are many learned men who teach these things?"

"Wa'al," said she, "if the airth is round, and goes round, what holds it up?"

"Oh, these learned men say it goes around the sun, and that the sun holds it up by virtue of the law of attraction," he replied.

The old lady lowered her "specs," and by way of climax responded:

"Wa'al, if these high larn't men sez the sun holds up the airth, I should like tu know what holds the airth up when the sun goes down!"

INTERIOR OF THE BOMBPROOF AT FORT FISHER, N. C., USED AS A HOSPITAL FOR REBEL WOUNDED.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, JOSEPH BECKER.

FORT FISHER, N. C.

We continue our most interesting illustrations of the last great event of the war. Our readers cannot fail to admire more and more the gallant conduct of our troops, when they contemplate the strength of the rebel fortress, and how admirably the outlying defences of Fort Buchanan and the Mound Battery are situated to render the principal one of Fort Fisher all but impregnable. In our last two papers we have so fully described the bombardment and capture of this famous stronghold, that we have merely on the present occasion to call attention to our Artist's graphic and comprehensive sketch, which shows, at a glance, how utterly impossible it is now for any supplies to reach the Confederacy through this, the last mouth of a dying body. It is to be regretted that the rebel pirate ship Tallahassee managed to escape, after running completely into the lion jaws of Admiral Porter.

Our Artist says that there is no doubt that the explosion of the magazine, which took place on the morning after the formal surrender of Fort Fisher, was the deliberate act of the rebel authorities—an act so treacherous and barbarous, as to fully justify the severest retaliatory measures on our part. It is, however, perhaps as well that we should show as much superiority in our humanity as we do in our achievements; but we venture to say that no such magnanimity would be shown by one European power to another. It will be remembered in the Crimean war, that, when the Russian soldiers murdered some wounded French soldiers who were left on the field of battle, Marshal Pelissier sent word to the Russian General that if such an outrage occurred again he would hang the Grand Dukes if they should ever fall into his hands. What retaliation could be too severe for such an atrocity as to attach a wire to the magazine of a fort before its surrender, and then fire it ten hours after it had been in our possession?

It was to Fort Buchanan that the rebels conveyed their wounded commanders, Gen. Whiting and Col. Lamb, and to which about 700 of their troops retreated during the last struggle in Fort Fisher. The correspondent of the New York Times says that the scene which presented itself in the fort when it fell into our hands showed the desperate courage with which the enemy had defended their stronghold.

GREAT FIRE IN BUFFALO, N. Y.

MR. H. L. BLISS, a photographer in Buffalo, has obliged us with several views of the late conflagration in that city, from which we have selected one for engraving. Our illustration represents the view from Eagle street, extending to and including one-half of the American Hotel.

The fire was first discovered in the premises of Mr. Peter Diehl, No. 266 Main street, about 4½ o'clock on the morning of Jan. 26, and is supposed to have originated in the cooking range of his restaurant. The alarm was promptly given, and the fire department was as promptly on hand; but the fierceness of the gale, the intense cold and the blinding snow conspired against them, and rendered the handling of the hose exceedingly difficult. Many of the lines were frozen up and rendered comparatively useless, by being cemented solidly to the streets. These embarrassments to contend with, the best efforts of the gallant firemen were impotent. The flames spread with considerable rapidity, and soon had communicated to other buildings, till the building known as the Republican Block, containing the clothing store of Conrad Sippel, Mr. Dodd's restaurant, Richard Jensen's drug store, and Van Velzer's bakery, were utterly destroyed.

Attention was then directed to the American Hotel, but up to nearly eight o'clock it was confidently thought the building could be saved. The high wind blowing from the southwest pressed the flames towards that building, and soon after the hour indicated the hotel was on fire, and the flames swept through the structure with a fury that could not be managed. It was a war in which the misdirected elements were arrayed against a few men whose weapons lay useless on the ground, and although the latter fought with desperate energy, they were overpowered at every point.

It was disheartened to arrest the progress of the flames by blowing up the Eagle Hotel, which was done by the explosion of 120 pounds of powder, several adjacent stores falling with the ruins. Three brave youths belonging to the fire department, named respectively Sidney, Gillet and Judd, lost their lives in the heroic discharge of their duty. They were buried by a falling wall, in the rear of the American Hotel.

The damage has been estimated as high as $750,000. The American was worth about $200,000, against which Mr. Stevens and the heirs to the Tracy estate, part owners, have an insurance of $50,000, and Mr. Michaels, the principal owner, an insurance of $75,000. The furniture was valued at $30,000; insured for $12,000.

HEADQUARTERS AT WINCHESTER, VIRGINIA.

THE headquarters of Gen. Sheridan, at Winchester, Va., are in the late residence of Lloyd Logan, a wealthy tobacco-grower, now in Richmond. Gen. Milroy, upon his arrival, found the house occupied by the ladies and family of Mr. Logan. These were immediately forwarded to the rebel capital, to enjoy the society of their precious secessionists, and the mansion being cleansed of the taint of treason by ventilation and soapsuds, became the residence of our brave cavalier.

THE WESTERN DEFENCES OF SAVANNAH, GA.

ALTHOUGH Savannah must finally have fallen before the invincible army of Sherman, it is certain the enemy might have made an obstinate defence, and compelled a heavy sacrifice of life. Fortunately the scarcity of provisions and the lukewarmness of the inhabitants hastened Gen. Hardee to evacuate, rather than fight it out with the same obstinacy that Pemberton disputed inch by inch at Vicksburg.

Our Artist has sent us a sketch of the rebel defences on the west side of Savannah, which, as our readers can see for themselves, are well constructed, and capable of offering considerable resistance. The level nature, however, of the country around the city is not adapted to that obstinate fighting which more hilly ground presents, and consequently our superior artillery would soon have compelled their abandonment by the enemy.

THE WASHINGTON TRAGEDY.

SINCE the affair of Mr. Key and Gen. Sickles, no social event has caused so much excitement in Washington as the shooting of Mr. Andrew J. Burroughs, a clerk in the Treasury Department, by Mary Harris, a young woman who claims that he violated a marriage promise with her. The victim of the unwarrantable act is the brother of Dr. Burroughs, President of the Douglas College, Chicago, and formerly a clerk in the Currency Bureau Treasury. It appears that during his residence in Burlington, Iowa, he had become acquainted with Miss Harris—but we will give the unhappy girl's own words:

I am the daughter of William Harris of Burlington, Iowa; my parents are Irish, and are poor; am 19 years old; about seven years ago I became acquainted with Mr. Burroughs; he came frequently to see me at my father's house until he left Burlington; and for a long time I frequently sat in his lap in the presence of my parents; he always manifested great interest in me; he never odor, and his attentions became more of the character of a suitor, my parents opposed them, and told me that his family was too high for me; that he would never marry me, and that I should not keep company with him.

I disregarded them, persisted in seeing him, and became more and more attached to him. When he left Burlington, I did not ask him to write to me, but he had not been long gone when I received a letter from him, which I answered, and a correspondence was continued, which was sometimes interrupted by my refraining from writing to him. But he would persevere in renewing it, until I would be persuaded to write to him. Before he left Burlington he asked me to marry him; I refused because I felt that I was too young to disobey my parents in such a matter.

A few days before starting from Chicago (two weeks ago), I was walking along the street and saw some pistols in a shop window. Having learned that many of the ladies of Chicago carried pistols, especially when travelling, I determined to buy one, and at once bought the one.

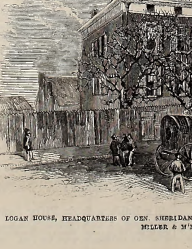
After my arrival here I became almost frantic with a desire to see him, and put on a "muslin" (which I was not wont to wear) and a veil, and so disguised, went to the Treasury.

When I went into the Treasury building, yesterday morning, I inquired for the room in which Mr. Burroughs was, and having learned that walked up and down the hall for some time. Once I went to the door of the room, opened it a few inches, and saw him at his desk. The second I looked at him, sitting there so comfortably, the thought of all I had suffered, and of his being the cause, enraged me, and my hand involuntarily pulled back the trigger of the pistol in my pocket. I closed the door, and stepping away, moved about again, I know not how or where, except that I kept my eye on his room until the men began to come out of their rooms. Then I placed myself where I knew he would have to come near me in going to the stairway. When he appeared I felt suddenly lifted up; my arm was extended as cold as iron, and I saw him fall. I know nothing more until I was called back when leaving the building. They say, what will they do with me? If it was not for my poor father and mother, I would not care.

She repeatedly reiterated her assevveration that there had been nothing improper between her and Mr. Burroughs.

REVOLUTIONS IN COSTUME.

THE changes of fashion, considered in the light of their relation to social usage, touch us the future, by reviewing philosophically the conduct of the past.



Revolutions in costume are periodical, as in almost everything else in this world. From the beginning of this century, when dresses were reduced to classic waterfall proportions, they have gradually increased in size till they have become so uncomfy and unmanageably distended that it is neither safe nor possible to wear them. Of course this applies more to feminine than to masculine costume, but both are progressing in a parallel line on the racing ground of fashion. Singularly enough, the tendency towards elaboration regularly coincides with the progress of the century. When a century, for instance, is in its first years, civilized humanity seems to feel young, and in no way easier to conceal under a pile of garments the beautiful forms granted to the hero of creation. As the century advances in years, fashion assumes naturally ideas and stately notions quite unknown to the preceding generations of beaux. And when the century approaches towards its completion, then all the resources, all the craft of millinery, tailoring and perfumery are brought to bear on the means of disdistinguishing old age and decrepitude. In the beginning of a century man is not ashamed of himself. With the same confidence of youth he walks in the streets and appears in assemblies dressed as nearly as possible as the man of nature. In the latter part of the century youth itself seems to delight in assuming the appearance of old age. The examination of any book of costume affords numberless illustrations of this inscrutable law of revolutions in dress, from the middle ages down to our own time.

Man's costume is naturally less exaggerated in form than the dresses of the fair sex. It is also slower in its modern development. Hats, for instance, although from time to time slightly modified in type, keep during a century the same general form. The eighteenth century was condemned to the ridiculous three-cornered hat; the nineteenth is doomed to the still uglier chimney-pot hat. Pity, writing on military costume, considered it an immense boon for the soldier the superseding of the hairpowder by the queue. He held that the suppression of the garter gave much more messiness to the movements of the leg. But the opinion of Pity is no longer that of any of the French military authorities, since, irresistibly drawn in the circle of revolving fashion, they have come back to breeches and leggings for French infantry. A similar attempt made by the volunteers in England is very likely to lead her soon, in a given time, back to the costume of their fathers.

As it is, we may fairly expect that the prevailing fashion of enormously distended dresses is to prevail during the rest of the century, in spite of all its perils and its ugliness. Our grandmothers had the doors of their houses raised and enlarged to allow the introduction of their hoop-dresses and their hoops. Similar alterations have been largely practised in our constructions, carriages, theatres, ball-rooms, etc., there is no chance of seeing the taste for the present bell-shaped dresses diminish or begin to disappear.

HOW TO DRESS FOR A PHOTOGRAPH.

ORANGE color, for certain optical reasons, is photographically black. Blue is white; other shades or tones of color are proportionally darker or lighter as they contain more or less of these colors. The progressive scale of photographic color commences with the lightest. The order stands thus: White, light blue, violet, pink, mauve, dark blue, lemon, blue green, bouble-brown, purple, red, amber, maroon, orange, dead black. Complexion has to be more considered in connection with dress. Blondes can wear much lighter colors than brunettes; the latter always present better pictures in dark dresses, but neither look well in positive white. Violent contrast of color should be especially guarded against. In photography, brunettes possess a great advantage over their fairer sisters. The lovely golden tresses lose all their transparent brilliancy, and are represented black; whilst the "bonnie blue e's," theme of rapture to the poet, is misery to the photographer; for it is put entirely out. The simplest and most effective way of removing the yellow color from the hair is to powder it of course; write it is thus brought to about the same photographic tint as in nature. The same thing with the sapphire complexions. A freckle, quite invisible at a short distance, is, on account of its yellow color, rendered most painfully distinct when photographed. The effect is not to be called in to do the assistance of art. Here to me is truth one word of general advice—false, as we have seen, is the most readily affected by the light, and the yellow the least; if, therefore, you would keep your complexion clear and free from sun freckles whilst taking your delightful rambles at the seaside, disport by all means in blue, and substitute a dark green or yellow one in its stead. Blue tulle offers no more obstruction to the actinic rays of the sun than blue silk. Half a yard of yellow will, though perhaps not very becoming, will be more efficacious and considerably cheaper than a quart of kalydor.

PETROLEUM AND "INSPIRIT."—We take an opportunity to call attention to a successful company, and give information to our readers at the same time. The New York and Liverpool Petroleum Co. had on the first day of 1865 prospered so well that they ceased to sell stock at $5 per share, and have since sold none at less than their full par of $25. At that price the remainder of the stock is rapidly going off. An overnight has caused some misunderstanding in this matter, which is of considerable importance to a corporation so largely patronized.

ARCANA WATCH.
An Elegant Novelty in Watches.

The cases of this watch are an entirely new invention, composed of a metal that resists oxidization, fuses together and plastished, producing an exact imitation of 18 carat gold, which will wear and retain and keep its color. They are as beautiful and durable as solid gold, and are admirably calculated, the cost, for one-fifth as beautifully designed, with Panel and Shield for name, with Panel, Push Pin, and engraved in the exact style of the celebrated Gold Hunting Lovers, and are really handsome and elegant, and so exact an imitation of gold, as to defy detection. The movements is manufactured for the well known St. John Watch Company of Europe, and are superbly finished, having engraved plates, fancy carved bridges, adjusting, recitalory, with gold balance, and the improved patent jewelled action, new lime dial and skeleton hands, and is warranted a good timekeeper. These watches are of three different sizes, the smallest being for ladies, and are all Hunting Cases. A case of six will be sent by mail or Express for $125. A sample will be sent in an elegant Morocco Case for $25, will readily sell for three times their cost. We are the sole agents for this watch in the United States, and none are genuine which do not bear our Trade Mark.

HOSTETTER'S
CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with poisonous liquors, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds purporting to be medicinal, but such a wide list of pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known then, that while all the different stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article resembling the Fusel oil, the PURE and GENUINE HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of the essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, alterative and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all the kindred complaints, the proprietors claim to have the world without a rival or competitor. Its sale has for years equalled the combined sales of all other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the confidence which sufferers have in its virtues cannot be equalled by individuals of the highest standing in every profession, trade and walk of life. Beware of malicious and impostrous.

HITCHCOCK'S ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF THE AMERICAN CIVIL WAR.
By Mrs. ANN S. STEPHENS.

This work when complete, will be composed of about 36 parts, one of which will be issued every two weeks. Each part will contain 32 pages of reading matter, and a Steel Engraving. Each Engraved Portrait of Distinguished Commanders (selected from both sides). The Engravings alone will be worth the cost of the whole work. The well-earned reputation of Mrs. Stephens as an American writer is a full guarantee that this compilation will be the Popular History of the day. The following Engravings will appear in the Authorized parts:

LIEUT.-GEN. GRANT, VICE-ADMIRAL FARRAGUT,
MAJOR-GEN. SHERMAN, " PORTER,
" THOMAS, GENERAL B. E. LEE,
" HANCOCK, STONEWALL JACKSON.

AGENTS WANTED.

The book cannot be had at bookstores, as it will be sold exclusively by subscription through authorized agents. Purchasers of Engravings and agents (both male and female), will be appointed in supreme districts to canvass upon liberal terms. Apply at once.

SOLDIERS, ATTENTION!

An agent will be appointed to canvass each Regiment, or Military Station, upon liberal terms. Those who subscribe can receive the work free of postage, and its pages will afford them instruction and entertainment during their leisure hours. When completed, they can mail it to their homes for preservation, and thus secure a valuable publication.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

In order to show at once what the character of the work will be, the publisher has now in the first eight parts, price 25 cents each, which will be sent, postpaid, on receipt of $2.
HENRY W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,
14 Chambers Street, New York.

NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 491—Vol. XIX.] NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 25, 1865. [Price 10 Cents. $4 00 Yearly. 13 Weeks $1 00.

Abraham Lincoln.

On the 8th inst. the two Houses of Congress met in convention to count the votes of electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, and they declared that Abraham Lincoln and Andrew Johnson had received two hundred and twelve votes, and George B. McClellan and George H. Pendleton twenty-one votes, respectively, for the offices of President and Vice-President of the United States. There were no votes from the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and Texas; and although there were votes presented purporting to come from Tennessee and Louisiana, they were not admitted. Had, however, all the votes from the States in rebellion been counted, together with those from Tennessee and Louisiana, and presuming they had been cast with those of New Jersey, Delaware and Kentucky, as they would doubtless have gone, still the result would have been the same—and Abraham Lincoln, in all cases, been elected our next President.

Under ordinary circumstances Mr. Lincoln would neither have been nominated or elected. It was not belief in his abilities that induced his nomination, nor was he elected from faith in his capacities or consistency. It was because the rebellion had made him the impersonation of the National cause by its vilification of his character, its slanders on his life and habits, and its thorough identification of him with the war and its objects. He was represented—and falsehood could no further go—as a sot, a debauchee, and a reckless and bloodthirsty tyrant, but little better than the King of Dahomey in instinct and conduct, whereas he was and is almost womanly in his sympathies, more than womanly weak in his concessions to treason and in his forgiveness of crime, and, in the plenitude of his kindly nature, mingled with a Spartan devotion to justice, more likely to sacrifice a friend than punish an enemy. It is better that the nation's heart should be represented in the executive chair than its head—the latter often erre, the former seldom. Mr. Lincoln is far from representing the National intellect; but his pulses keep tune with the National heart. He does not lead, but rather follows public convictions. His greatest errors have been an obstinacy which he has mistaken for consistency, more especially in all matters relating to individuals. His pigheadedness in retaining McClellan after events had demonstrated his incapacity, and when he of all men knew best the necessity of a change, and his present folly of retaining men in his cabinet whose worthlessness none know so well as himself, in defiance of the strongly expressed contempt of Congress and the country, are all proofs that he does not clearly appreciate his own position, nor always reflect the popular will. Per se, there is no man of less consequence in these United States than Abraham Lincoln of Illinois. A schoolboy would deserve flogging for sending out documents of such prodigious moment as come from his pen in phrase so mean and unbecoming. The dignity of this war has been sadly marred by the so-called State papers which it has called out on both sides—and by none more than by Mr. Lincoln's.

What we are driving at is this, that Mr. Lincoln owes his re-election, an event over which all good and true men devoutly rejoice, to no personal ability, or character, or distinction of his own. Nine-tenths of the men who voted for him—outside of Illinois, where every male of puberty is an office-holder—did so from no high appreciation of him as a man or a statesman, but because, by so doing, they conceived they were best promoting the welfare of the country. To use one of the President's favorite similes, "we could not swop horses while swimming the river."

Since the fact of his re-election became known Mr. Lincoln has done well. Men less pure in their purposes than he, in a similar position, would never have stepped from their pedestal to meet the informal Commissioners of a needless rebellion at Fortress Monroe; wiser men, perhaps, and more thorough statesmen by education, would never have so far derogated from their real or supposed dignity; few Presidents could have done the thing without a real derogation. But with the impulsive, honest and full-hearted Hoosier the act was thoroughly in keeping, and an evidence of honest and kindly purpose, to which the whole world must yield a secret "Amen!"

Dropping these somewhat rambling comments, and coming back to the events wherewith we started, there is a great lesson in the fact that Abraham Lincoln is declared President with acclaim, and with a material force at his command which this country has not seen rivalled, in that very capitol to which, only four years ago, he was obliged to steal at night and in disguise. The writer of this intends to witness his re-inauguration on the 4th of March, on the very spot where he stood, four years ago, sworn, with five hundred others, "doubly armed," to see that the President elect of the United States should mount, unimpeded and unimperilled, to that high eminence to which his countrymen had chosen him, notwithstanding Washington seethed with treason, and its streets were full of boasts that he should never take the oath prescribed by the Constitution! The unwilling witness of war will be the humble and grateful witness of peace; he who rang the war-bell on the capitol, and sent its alarum on the tremulous air, will sound the glad chimes of peace and the pæan of a regenerate country. Such has been the solemn duty, such we cannot but believe will be the happy duty of Abraham Lincoln, President-elect of the United States. God save the Union!

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Almanac for 1865.

The last edition of this valuable work of reference is now ready. Dealers and others who desire a supply should make immediate application. It is useless at this date to bring before the public the manifold features of interest in this publication, their appreciation is fully indicated by the popular demand. The book is a complete compendium of all sorts of information of universal value. There are about two hundred distinct articles mostly illustrated, besides lithographic portraits of Grant and Ferragut, executed in a high style of art. Information for the people has rarely been condensed in such an admirable form. It is undoubtedly superior to its prototype, the London Illustrated Almanac, while the price, 50 cents, is lower.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Illustrated Almanac for 1865.

This annual contains a greater amount of useful and entertaining information than any publication of the kind ever issued. It is indeed the only Lady's Illustrated Almanac published. It is embellished with over 70 beautiful engravings, by the finest Artists of the day, executed in the highest style of art. It contains directions for the parlor, ball-room, boudoir, store-room, kitchen, garden, nursery and sick-room. In a word, it is the matron's vade mecum, as well as the young lady's companion, and it should be found in every household. In addition to general illustrations, it contains splendid portraits of Mrs. Lincoln and Mrs. McClellan, exquisitely engraved on steel, and a graphic Bathing-Scene at Long Branch, printed on fine paper. This complete Lady's Manual—which contains more reading matter than an octavo volume—costs only 50 cents. It will be sent, postage free, on receipt of the price, either in currency or postage stamps. The introduction of silk plush for hats, as substitute for beaver, has brought about some curious changes in the fur market; for example, in 1827, 1828 and 1829 mink skins were worth in New York from 37 to 40 cents each. Now these skins are worth from $8 to $9. Muskrat skins were then worth 50 cents each and are now worth about the same.

The Peace Palaver and its Result.

We have not the space necessary for the reproduction of the reports of the various parties to the late Peace Conference at Fortress Monroe. That of the Rebel Commissioners is clear, straightforward, precise and compact. That of the President muddled, voluminous, technical, and full of that astounding (not to say characteristic) style of composition which has made most of the State papers that have come from the same source a disgrace even to the imperfect common school education of the country. One fairly writhes with mingled pain, laughter and pity when he finds the concluding paragraph of what we are bound to suppose was a serious executive document, on a subject of vital national importance, commencing with small-country lawyer rigmarole, as follows:

"On our part, the whole substance of the instructions to the Secretary of State hereinbefore recited, stated, and insisted upon, and nothing was said inconsistently therewith, while by the other party, etc., etc."

Shades of John Doe and Richard Roe! Peace, perturbed spirits!

The report of Mr. Seward comes in the form of a dispatch to Mr. Adams, has the usual turgidity, mixed with elaborate utterances of commonplaces and platitudes. We are told that "the advocates of war, after an agitation, longer or shorter, generally gain their fearful end, though the war declared is not unfrequently unnecessary and unwise." We are not told, however, "that two and two are numbers that have not unfrequently, it may be perhaps affirmed that they have always, by persons not incompetent to make the calculation, been understood to make up a sum total not much exceeding, nor materially falling short of, precisely four!"

The State papers elicited by this war, and the military reports generally, will give posterity a very low estimate of the taste and intelligence of the age and people. From the time that McClellan wrote from South Mountain, not that "God has mercifully vouchsafed us a victory," or "We have met the enemy and they are ours," but "Gen. Lee publicly admits that he was shockingly whipped!" down to Porter's rambling and undignified narration of the capture of Fort Fisher, we have had little indeed to be proud of in the way of army reports. Gen. Grant's concise, modest and direct recital of his Vicksburg campaign stands almost alone among the documents emanating from our military commanders that will not disfigure the page of history.

To return, however, from this digression. The various reports of the parties to the Peace interview all concur in their essential points. The President tells us that the Southern Commissioners abstained from saying positively that they never would consent to re-union "in any event or any condition," but "seemed to desire a postponement of that question, and the adoption of some other course first, which, as some of them seemed to argue, might or might not lead to re-union." Mr. Seward informs us that nothing was written or read on either side, and that the "Richmond party" at no time made "categorical demands nor tendered formal stipulations or absolute refusals." What they "seemed chiefly to favor was a postponement of the question of separation, upon which the war is waged, and a mutual direction of the efforts of the Government, as well as those of the insurgents, to some extrinsic policy or scheme, for a season, during which passions might be expected to subside, and the armies be reduced, and trade and intercourse between the people of both sections be resumed. It was suggested by them that through such postponement we might now have immediate peace, with some not very certain prospect of an ultimate satisfactory adjustment of the political relations between the Government and the States, section, or people, now engaged in conflict with it."

This suggestion was not accepted by the President, inasmuch as it could be regarded as signifying an armistice, and he announced that—

"The United States can agree to no cessation or suspension of hostilities, except on the basis of the disbandment of the insurgent forces, and the restoration of the national authority throughout all the States in the Union collaterally; and in subordination to the proposition which was thus announced, the anti-slavery policy of the United States was reviewed in all its bearings, and the President announced that he must not be expected to depart from the positions he had heretofore assumed in his proclamation of emancipation, and other documents, as these positions were reiterated in his annual message. It was further declared by the President that the complete restoration of the national authority everywhere was an indispensable condition of any assent on our part to whatever form of peace might be proposed. The President assured the other party that while he must adhere to these positions, he would be prepared, so far as power is lodged with the Executive, to exercise liberality."

Messrs. Stephens, Hunter and Campbell, or as Mr. Seward styles them, the "Richmond party," report substantially the same result. They say:

"We understood from him [President Lincoln] that no terms or proposals of any treaty or agreement looking to an ultimate settlement would be entertained or made by him with the authorities of the Confederate States, because that would be a recognition of their existence as a separate power, which, under no circumstances, would be done; and, for like reasons, that no such terms would be entertained by him from the States separately; that no extended truce or armistice (as at present advised) would be granted or allowed without a satisfactory assurance, in advance, of a complete restoration of the authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States over all places within the States of the Confederacy.

"That whatever consequences may follow from the re-establishment of that authority must be accepted. But that individuals subject to pains and penalties under the laws of the United States might rely upon a very liberal use of the power confided to him to remit those pains and penalties if peace be restored."

Mr. Jefferson Davis, in communicating this report to the Rebel Congress, states that he understands the position of the United States to be this: "that it will not enter into negotiations with the Confederate States, or any one of them separately, or to give to our people any other terms or guarantees than those which the conqueror may grant, or to permit us to have peace on any other basis than our unconditional submission to their rule, coupled with the acceptance of their recent legislation, including an amendment to the Constitution for the emancipation of all the negro slaves, and with the right on the part of the Federal Congress to legislate on the subject of the relations between the white and black population of each State."

This appears to be the end of all efforts at adjustment between the Government and the rebels for the present. After the capture of Richmond and Charleston it is not unlikely peace overtures may again be made. Not until then.

In these times of war, when hundreds die in a day for that which we all deem most precious, the national life, it is not amazing that those who have contributed to make us what we are, whether in art, mechanics, or science, should "pass away," with scarce a word of eulogy. We have already briefly noticed, in a paragraph which in its proportions might not exceed that devoted to the record of a fire or a murder, the death of a man who has done more for the organization of science in America, than any man who ever lived—we allude to Prof. Benjamin Silliman, senior, of Yale College, New Haven. He died on the 24th of Nov. last, at the ripe age of 85 years—of which more than 40 were dedicated to what we have already designated as the "organization" of American science, mainly through "Silliman's American Journal of Arts and Sciences," which, although published in the essentially non-metropolitan town of New Haven, has attained a deserved world-renown. Prof. Silliman was not a great discoverer, nor did he aspire to personal aggrandisement. A thorough student, every co-worker had an appeal to his heart and sympathies, and he shared in none of those petty jealousies and contemptible bickerings which disgrace the parvenus and charlatans of science. Truth to him was, of all things, great and good, and he valued men mainly as they contributed to its establishment. He cared not if a bug was named after Silliman or Smith, but wished only to have its family and relations well defined; nor did he care by whom the greatest problems of natural science were solved—whether by the young student or the sinecured professor. "Is it not true?" was the sole question which he propounded, and the promulgator of a single truth was, to him, a claim to respect and a title more precious than that of knighthood. Prof. Silliman was the Washington of American science. It is not given to all men to triumph in the same field, but in every department of life and in its pursuits men may achieve their respective victories—the great future of mankind will award the meed of honor to him who is most deserving.

A correspondent of the London Athenæum gives us an account of Prof. Silliman's death on that "Thanksgiving Day" with which so many of our happiest and holiest recollections are associated:

"On the night previous to his death he retired to rest as well as usual. In the morning he awoke cheerful, and happy in the thought of beholding a bright, clear morning on the return of another Thanksgiving Day, with his numerous family. He breathed a short prayer in bed, telling his wife that he should, on this morning, make his family prayer rather longer than usual. Very soon after saying this, he asked his wife to put her hand under his head. In the act of doing this, to Mrs. Silliman's amazement, a sudden change came over his face; he closed his eyes, and without saying a word or moving a muscle of his body, passed away! It was, indeed, a translation from earth to heaven. I never saw so beautiful a countenance in death. I gazed on it with wonder, and could not realise the fact of death; it seemed that he might at any moment awake. I was much impressed with the remark of one of his grandchildren—a girl of six years. She 'did not like it, because it looked so young.' Prof. Silliman was 85. He was a noble, generous-hearted Christian gentleman; with him science and religion went hand in hand. Ever cheerful and happy himself, he tried to make others the same and died, as he had lived, one of the best of men."

Our dead soldiers are now buried with great care, and in a way to facilitate the efforts of their friends to recover their bodies, should it be wished to transfer them to the quiet country churchyard, where all would like to lie by the side of the friends and relations who have gone before. A correspondent in the Army of the Potomac tells us that:

"A plain coffin is procured, and the deceased placed in it, prepared as decently for his eternal sleep as his habiliments will allow. In the coffin with him is put a bottle tightly corked, and within it is a scrap of paper telling his name, rank, company and regiment, and date and cause of death. Every division hospital has its plat of ground for burial purposes, and in this the worn-out soldier is put to rest. In addition to this precaution, a headboard is always placed at the grave, giving the same facts, and a recent excellent order from Gen. Meade has prescribed the minutiæ of burial, all the provisions tending to inculcate respect for the dead and consideration for the survivors, by giving the latter every possible facility for future identification."

A General may be great out of the field as well as in it, in private as well as public life. We have no officer who stands higher as a soldier and a man than Gen. Thomas, the victor of Nashville, and he has written a letter in reply to a proposition made by some of his friends and admirers, to raise him a sum of money as a testimonial, which will further elevate his reputation before the world. He says:

"Whilst I am duly and profoundly sensible of the high compliment thus proposed to be paid me, I would greatly prefer, and, if not premature, request, that any sum which may be raised for that purpose may be devoted to the founding of a fund for the relief of disabled soldiers, and of the indigent widows and orphans of officers and soldiers who have lost their lives during this war. I am amply rewarded when assured that my humble services have met with the approbation of the Government and the people."

The Temps of Paris, of Jan. 3d, reviews the situation of affairs in the United States, but "only for form's sake," and adds:

"Europe can do nothing in the matter, and the most chimerical minds have ceased to speak of intervention. For the old world, this unprecedented struggle is a spectacle rich in lessons, at the same time formidable and consolatory. By the cost now imposed on the United States to extirpate slavery, it displays the terrible justice of history, and shows by what fearful sacrifices nations expiate the prolonged tolerance of wrong. It also exhibits, by the incredible facility of those sacrifices, that abundance of material and moral resources of which no idea existed, and above all, shows, by the little loss of liberty they have involved, that liberty is not fatally destined to perish in the tempests of civil wars. On this point all European ideas, including our own, are completely bewildered. The re-election of Mr. Lincoln, and the manner in which it was accomplished, are the pledge of an indestructible liberty, and will remain in history as an imperishable pledge of political and moral greatness. Those are great lessons of which Europe has besides contributed to pay the costs by the reaction of the cotton crisis; but those are precisely only lessons. The facts, whether they please or not, are quite out of reach of European action, and this is now a truth generally admitted."

Summary of the War.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Through the rebel papers we learn that Branchville was occupied by a portion of Gen. Sherman's forces on the 9th inst.—thus isolating Charleston, and rendering the surrender of that city almost a foregone conclusion—indeed, the Richmond papers of the 11th spread the rumor of its being already evacuated. The probability is that the rebel army therein will make their escape as Gen. Hardee's forces did from Savannah, and scatter in all directions.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Gen. Terry has commenced operations against Wilmington, whose fall is now a matter of a few days more. Fort Anderson has been bombarded by some U. S. gunboats, preparatory to a final attack upon it.

MISSISSIPPI.

The rebel papers announce that Gen. Thomas has commenced a new campaign, which seems to threaten Mobile.

VIRGINIA.

The quiet which has for some time reigned in the armies before Richmond and Petersburg was broken on Sunday, the 5th, when the 2d and 5th corps made an advance on the rebels' right line in the direction of Hatcher's run and Dabney's mill, to the south of Petersburg. After considerable fighting on the 5th and 6th inst. our troops retained their advanced position, having extended their lines more than five miles. This position has been so strongly fortified as to assure us it is another step towards the complete beleaguring of Richmond. Our loss in the above movement has been about 1,300 men, killed, wounded and missing.

Gen. Grant was in Washington, Saturday, the 11th, and testified before the Committee on the Conduct of the War concerning the exchange of prisoners, in regard to which he said that the matter was now entirely in his hands; that he had made an arrangement for the exchange to go on man for man, until the entire number held by one side or the other should be exhausted; and that the delivery of our men would now go on at the rate of 3,000 or more per week, the Salisbury and Danville prisoners coming first. Gen. Grant afterward visited both Houses of Congress in session, and was received with marked distinction.

THE OIL REGION.

The New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore Consolidated Petroleum and Mining Company.

There are Bulls and Bears in all stock operations, and they are to be found elsewhere than on the street or the 'change. In our newspapers we can trace these rival operators, one party advertising this great article of commerce, the other crying it down and denouncing it in the most unmeasured terms. Where such enormous and constantly increasing interests are concerned, we must expect this, and we view it as an evidence of the absorbing interest felt in it by the public, and as a confirmation of the almost fabulous wealth and resources of the oil country.

As we have before stated, the operations throughout the whole oil regions have been partially suspended for five or six weeks, in consequence of the continued cold weather. It is impossible to convey water to the engines, and Oil creek, itself, is frozen solid. But if operations are suspended, the work of preparation is going on with extraordinary activity, and when the frost breaks up, there will be three wells going down for every one now in existence.

The newest excitement in the oil region is directed to the land around Elk creek, in Erie county, Penn., the development of which was commenced in the fall of last year. Here the "New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore Consolidated Petroleum and Mining Company" has some of its most valuable property. The value of land has advanced enormously; the Company, within a few days, was offered for a very small parcel of its property on the Wilcox farm Thirty-five thousand dollars ($35,000) cash.

On Sugar creek, which has also been recently developed, this Company also holds valuable property. On the land immediately adjoining theirs, the Saunders' farm, there is one well which is producing 25 barrels per day of the finest lubricating oil. They also have a well down some 300 feet, which gives strong indication of the same valuable product. So valuable do they consider this property, that they have erected on it a hotel, for their superintendent and their laborers. The spring will develope this property in its resources of inestimable value.

The "New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore Consolidated Petroleum and Mining Company," has only been before the public four or five weeks, and yet $200,000 of the $300,000 of stock have been subscribed for here—a success altogether unprecedented in the history of oil speculations. Reports from the Baltimore and Philadelphia offices will, in all probability, enable the Company to close its books before the 1st of March.

This success was not altogether unexpected, for the intrinsic value of the property it owns is well known to those who have the largest investments in oil, and the judgment of Capt. J. S. Clark, who has explored every acre of the region from the commencement of the excitement, and who is a President not only in name but in activity and supervision, has imparted a confidence as to the stability of the Company which has resulted in this remarkably rapid sale of the stock.

It is acknowledged by those conversant with the districts in which the property of the "New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore Consolidated Petroleum and Mining Company" is situated, that their land in fee simple and in lease, if thrown on the market to-day, would realise between five and six hundred thousand dollars ($600,000). The value of judgment, founded upon personal experience and actual survey, in the choice of oil lands, cannot be over-estimated. It is the very best security that holders of stock can have, as to the sterling value of their investments.

NEW MUSIC.

WE take with pleasure this opportunity to direct the attention of our musical readers to two new songs by our celebrated composer and pianist, Franz Schlotter; the one a charming ballad to the words of Rev. G. Wolf, "Go, forget me!" &c.; the other adapted to a translation from the German of Uhland, with English and German texts. The latter composition is treated by the composer with true poetic spirit and feeling, and must, we think, become a favorite song. We may also add neither of these pieces are difficult of execution, but, nevertheless, are very effective in style.

TOWN GOSSIP.

WE have had so many and such absurd changes of weather during the last week, that one could only account for them by supposing that the agent who has charge of that department was determined for once to gratify everybody, and stop, if possible, the faultfinding that has gone on ever since human beings had a tongue in which they could carp and say disagreeable things.

But we doubt if it has had the desired effect, and we must confess that in our case natural depravity is so strong that the most we could say in favor of the plan would be that some of the changes were less disagreeable than others.

The skating most of the time has been excellent; during a day or two the ice was so rough from continuous use that the devotees of that amusement were forced to rest on their irons, but they made up for the pause at the first opportunity by more insane energy than before.

We have had balls without stint or cessation by nearly all the ball-giving associations in the city, and the annual one of the Arion Society came off at the Academy of Music last Thursday with unusual brilliancy.

The truth is, there never was such sport to be had anywhere as at a masquerade; one has an opportunity to do and say such delightfully impertinent and outrageous things, and really it is very jolly to find just how impudent one is capable of being.

The opera season has waxed more and more brilliant as the nights go on, though we are not sure that it did not reach its culminating point in the way of brilliancy and hearty satisfaction in last Friday's evening of "Traviata," with Zucchi perfectly delightful in the rôle of Violetta.

Mr. Gonzalez has commenced at Clinton Hall a series of Sunday Sacred Concerts, which promise to be very successful. The selections so far have been made with much taste, comprising some of the most delightful morceaux from the works of the greatest masters of the Italian and German schools.

The theatres generally are doing nothing remarkably new, but night after night every place of amusement is crowded to overflowing. It really seems as if our citizens never felt the need of relaxation and distraction so much as now.

Is it because everybody is growing rich, and all sorts of pleasures that money can purchase may be freely indulged in; or is it only to keep as far away as possible from the sober thoughts which, during hours of solitude, must intrude after the mad whirl of speculation and business in which the day is consumed?

Somewhat ungracious questions to ask, and not a pleasant subject to pursue—let us leave it and be content, as the managers probably are, to know that, whatever may be the reason, gaily dressed crowds fill the theatres, and enjoy to the utmost such novelties as those autocrats are pleased to offer.

Last week, Monday, Mrs. Lander commenced her engagement at Niblo's. As might have been expected, from her former great reputation as an actress, and the new interest thrown about her by the devotion she has shown our wounded soldiers, a crowded and appreciative audience greeted her return to the stage, and received her with that enthusiasm which New Yorkers can display when they see fit.

"Mésalliance" has been several times performed here under different names, and was, if we do not mistake, originally translated by Mrs. Lander herself. We cannot say that we like the play particularly; it is dreadfully Frenchy, the plot exceedingly wiredrawn, and the whole thing would be so obviously improved by judicious cutting that we wonder it has not been done.

During the opening scenes Mrs. Lander was scarcely herself, nor was there much opportunity for her to display her powers; but in the second act she recovered her self-possession, her beautiful voice took its clearest, richest tones, and from that time till the close of the piece not a point was lost, not a speech slurred.

The scene in the prison gave, perhaps, an opportunity for the finest acting; there Mrs. Lander was truly magnificent. She is undoubtedly the most finished actress upon the stage; she never rants nor raves, nor does she constantly strike attitudes by way of being always picturesque or statuesque, but every movement is so graceful and ladylike, her acting so intense and impassioned, yet so true to nature, that she gives one that rare pleasure of seeing genius, which has been willing, by earnest study and devotion to art, to bring its highest qualities under perfect control.

As a general thing she is well supported. Miss Wells and Mr. Burnett are especially good in their respective parts, a thing one can always say of these two conscientious, painstaking and very agreeable artists.

Barnum, who always contrives to have something novel to amuse his patrons, whose name is legion, whatever may be the case with other managers, is having a great run with "Azucena; or, the Gipsy's Vengeance." Besides this, he gives a charming spectacular piece, called "The Ring of Fate," and between the two the Lecture-room is jammed every afternoon and evening beyond the possibility even of standing-room.

Every week new curiosities are added to the countless hosts that already crowd the Museum, and, as usual, whatever triumph he may reach, Barnum's motto is still "Excelsior!"

It is said that Tennyson is to be made a baronet. Certainly her Majesty of England will show her own good taste and appreciation of genius by tacking this handle to the minstrel's name, and, into the bargain, "Sir Alfred" will sound rather prettily. But, after all, when a man has made his name a household word at home and abroad by his glorious creations, when his songs are on the lips of every young girl, and his poems find a place in every library and every heart, no sovereign on earth can add to his dignity, either by titles or lands. Whoever cares about his being poet laureate?—only if the traditional pipe of Madeira accompanies the position, it is pleasant to think of the bard quaffing the golden elixir—and if they made a duke of him to-morrow, it wouldn't be half as grand a title as that of "Author of the Idyls of the King."

Florence has lately been interesting itself in a subject which some years since made a brief sensation in this country—the very curious idea of making photography a detective agent.

Enlarged photographs were taken of the eye of a murdered woman, in which could be discovered the outlines of a human face, which really did, or was fancied by many, to resemble the men who had been arrested for the crime.

The question is still a disputed point, but we are so accustomed to marvels that if it should prove to be a new discovery in the world of science, we should receive it very quietly, only taking good care to have a mask ready when we wanted to do a little amateur business in the way of assassinating somebody.

They have discovered a quicksilver mine in the streets of Valparaiso, and as several houses are built over the vein, probably they will do as was proposed in regard to sundry oil derricks that grace Oil City—make the entrance in the parlors, and instead of treating visitors to music or boring them with cards or conversation, exhibit the quicksilver mine.

Some man has brought a variety of libel suits against different parties in which the united damages that he claims will amount to $59,000,000. Now that is going to law on a grand scale—we admire the man's genius—why, it is like reading the Arabian Nights or Monte Christo just to think of it. Even to have got up such a suit, without a probability of realising anything, ought to make a man happy for life from the glow that one such golden dream, however baseless, would fling over all coming time.

Nothing could be a pleasanter sight or a surer proof of a growing taste among our citizens to cultivate the beautiful than the increase of flower-shops along Broadway during the past year or two.

Somebody says that "flowers are like children, always opening their pure hearts to heaven, and inviting us to look there also;" and there is a world of truth in the beautiful simile. If people did but understand more generally how a tithe of the money spent in decorating a dinner-table with plate would be better expended in a daily ornament of flowers for the board, it does seem as if they would prefer showing that they possessed some claim to refined and æsthetic tastes to advertising the amount of their fortunes by the number of silver dishes they owned.

Certainly more happiness could be obtained from a conservatory than by wasting vast sums in crowding rooms with costly furniture in the most incongruous taste, till in walking through them one passes every style of furniture, from the heavy medieval down to the modern, as if everybody had turned spiritualist, and wanted to have a chair suited to the ideas of each ghost, from the times of Charlemagne down to the rich uncle who died last year, who might chance to drop in for a friendly call. The benefit it would be to children, the daily and hourly pleasure to all concerned are things to be taken into consideration by those who have brains enough to know that the happiness we win from life is in proportion to the extent to which we cultivate each pure and refined taste of our natures.

Even with moderate means it is so easy to beautify one's dwelling in that manner. A stand of plants in a window, an ivy-vine trained over an arch, shall give an apartment an air of elegance and grace which no amount of gilded ornaments or silken curtains could do.

We always want to adore a woman who wears flowers instead of jewels with a ball toilette. After one has waded through an evening's Pontine Marsh of parties and pomposities, the sight of a woman thus decorated is a positive relief from the glitter of jewels and the sight of the marvelous beasts with which our modern Eves at present overload their heads and necks. She absolutely brings to mind the fresh, honest feelings which every man is supposed to possess somewhere among his household deities, however much they be neglected. Indeed, if a woman like that has not often been a direct ministering angel, by reminding some mother, by the sight of those pure flowers, of the household blossoms, the little children left at home to the care of a menial, and the means of making many a man seek his family treasures, instead of finishing his night at a supper or a faro table, we are more mistaken in our knowledge of human nature than our natural vanity will permit us to believe.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The town of Hadley, Mass., raised 530 tons of tobacco last year, and 40 or 50 tons of the weed have been sold there within a few days. A man in Easthampton raised 4,400 pounds on two acres of land last year, and sold it for 28 cents per pound throughout. It is estimated that the tobacco crop of Easthampton is worth $40,000 to that town.

—— A correspondent of the Albany Evening Journal relates the following: "As I was standing in the Capitol Park, Wednesday morning, watching the firing of the cannon, a lady, draped in deep black, stopped and asked 'if they were firing on account of the Constitutional amendment?' She was told 'yes.' 'Oh!' said she, 'let me fire one gun for Free America!' She pulled the string without flinching, and walked quietly away. It struck me that she might be wearing black for some dear one who had given his life for his country, and if so, she would enjoy the satisfaction that it had not been given in vain.

—— A bill has been introduced in the New York Assembly, providing that the Governor, Lieutenant-Governor and Secretary of State shall be a commission to locate the Capitol at such city as shall offer the strongest inducements and prove the most available site outside the city of Albany.

—— Seventy-two degrees of Doctor of Divinity have been conferred by American colleges upon clergymen in the United States, and 29 degrees of Doctor of Laws upon various individuals, during the past year.

—— The Toronto Leader has an indignant article, denouncing the surrender of the rebel raider Burley to the United States authorities. It is specially angry that he should have been delivered up at midnight.

—— In accordance with the agreement with Brazil, the crew of the rebel pirate Florida has been sent out on board a steamer to England.

—— The Boston Transcript says that since 1844 there has been a snowstorm in the first four days of February, with only the exception of 1857.

—— An enterprising man in Dryden, N. Y., had the misfortune to lose his wife on a Sunday; on Monday he married his servant girl; on Tuesday they attended the funeral of the deceased together, the new wife wearing the old one's clothes.

—— The port of Fernandina, Florida, has been opened to trade in cotton and other products of the Southern States, on Government account, and Mr. Kilbourne has been appointed agent there.

—— The vote in the House of Representatives carrying the Constitutional amendment on the 31st of Jan. was 119 to 56. As it passed the Senate last year, it has now only to be submitted to the people.

Western.—Gov. Lewis, of Wisconsin, has issued a proclamation, warning the people against countenancing any outbreak, which there are some fears may take place, in consequence of the sale of farm lands mortgaged in aid of railroads.

—— A company of 43 women recently attempted to flee from the bonds of Mormonism in Utah, but they were overtaken and carried back to their lords and masters.

—— The Ohio House of Representatives is discussing the question of electing a young lady as clerk of that body. It has been referred to the Judiciary Committee to ascertain whether such an election would be constitutional.

Southern.—The seal of the rebel States of America is described in the English newspapers. It is designed by Foley, the celebrated Irish sculptor, and contains in the centre a representation of Crawford's statue of Washington. This is surrounded by a wreath, composed of the most valuable vegetable products of the Southern soil—tobacco, rice, Indian corn, cotton, wheat and sugar-cane. The rim bears the legend: "The Confederate States of America, 22d of February, 1862, Deo vindice." The seal is of silver and its diameter is four inches.

—— The scarcity of arms in rebeldom may be gathered from the fact that Gen. Lee has issued a proclamation, appealing to all citizens to give up to the Government every description of gun, pistol, revolver, etc. He says that a receipt will be given for such arms as may be delivered, and a fair remuneration paid their owners.

Military.—The Committee on the Conduct of the War have made their report on the mine explosion failure, 26th July, before Petersburg. It seems to throw the onus of the failure on Gen. Meade.

—— The army appropriations for this year are $511,000,000, against $620,000,000 last year.

Naval.—The steamship Queen, the first American vessel bearing the flag of a Vice-Admiral in our navy, arrived at City Point, James river, on Friday of last week, with Vice-Admiral Farragut on board.

—— The navy appropriations for this year are about $8,000,000, against $10,000,000 last year.

Personal.—An exchange paper says that Gottschalk's agent recently ran away with $20,000 belonging to that eminent pianist.

—— Hon. Gustovus A. Koerner, of Illinois, U. S. Minister to Spain, has resigned his position.

—— Chief Justice Chase read his first opinion on the 6th inst., in the case of the Circassian, to the effect that the capture of New Orleans by Butler and Farragut did not terminate the blockade.

—— A number of citizens residing in Philadelphia have recently made Mrs. Grant, the wife of our Lieutenant-General, the present of a superb piano, valued at $1,200.

Obituary.—Marie, Countess de Tocqueville, widow of the well-known writer on the United States, died in France recently, in her 60th year. She was almost as famous as her husband in the literary world.

—— Baron Achard, a distinguished French General, died on the 7th Jan. aged 87. A soldier of the first Republic of 1793, he received 27 wounds, some of them very severe. He was the oldest General in Europe, having received his commission as General in 1823. He was the General who had the courage to tell the great Napoleon on the morning of Waterloo that he did not think he would gain the battle, in consequence of his depending so much upon strategy.

—— Major W. W. Anderson, of the 20th Pennsylvania cavalry, was recently killed by falling from his horse in an apoplectic fit in Pleasant Valley.

Accidents and Offences.—A man named Bivins last week shot his father, mother and wife, at Woodstock, Mich., in order to marry a young woman with whom he had become enamored. After the triple murders he set the house on fire. After his arrest he made a full confession.

—— A respectable German, August Herkerman, recently committed suicide in Philadelphia by drinking strychnine, the reason being that he had not succeeded so well in this country as he had expected.

—— A lady skater, in Philadelphia, lately fell upon the ice, with hands extended to break the fall, just as a swift skater was gliding past. He could not check his speed, and one of his sharp skates cut off three of her fingers.

—— On the night of the 8th inst. a most destructive fire broke out in Philadelphia, owing to the burning of some coal oil—47 houses were destroyed and several lives lost, the unhappy persons being literally roasted alive.

—— Col. Baker, of the War Department, after three weeks incessant labor, has succeeded in ferreting out the most astounding plot for cheating the Government out of men and the State of money, by a complicated system of bounty jumping and forgery. Twenty-seven of the principal criminals have been arrested, some of them Government officials.

—— There is reason to believe that the death of Mr. Branch, the broker, who was killed by a brick falling on him, was not attributable to accident, but design.

Foreign.—A violent shock of an earthquake was felt about eight o'clock in the evening on the 15th ult., in Bavaria. In Partenkirchen and Garmisch the log houses trembled, and all their furniture began to stagger; mirrors and pictures on the walls swung to and fro, and the poultry, domestic animals and cage birds were roused from their sleep. The terrified population rushed into the streets, many of them believing the world was coming to an end.

—— It has recently been determined by the Prussian authorities that marriages concluded simply by Dissenting clergymen, and not by ministers of the Evangelical or Catholic church, have no official validity. All the children of such marriages are declared illegitimate.

—— A geographical discovery far more important than the source of the Nile has just been made in South America. The river Amazon has been found to be navigable from one end to the other, so that a new route has been opened between the Atlantic and the Pacific. The Morona, a Peruvian steamer, which was sent to explore the Amazon, has arrived at Mayro, about 300 miles from Lima. The Morona navigated more than 2,500 miles of the Amazon proper, and 600 of the Yeayali and the Pachitea rivers, which, until then, had been only Indian canoes. The country is, of course, inhabited only by savages, but it is of wonderful fertility.

—— The sympathisers with secesh held a meeting at Toronto on the 3d Feb. to pass a vote of censure on the Canadian Government for delivering up Burley to the United States; but the result was that upon somebody proposing a vote of thanks it was carried, to the great confusion of the rebel sympathisers.

—— A correspondent in Japan gives a curious picture of the progress of European ideas in that once exclusive land—among other items it gives this: "There is a strong body of British troops in Japan. On the 20th of October some 1,600 men were publicly reviewed, to the great delight and astonishment of the Japanese. As a singular coincidence the national Japanese troops were also reviewed on the same parade by the side of the British soldiers. Their war dresses were very picturesque and were much admired."

—— The correspondent of the Boston Transcript says: "Things are rapidly approaching their normal state in Lancashire. The supply of cotton from various parts of the world soon set all the cotton mills again in motion, and, except on the score of price, it matters little when the civil strife across the Atlantic may cease. The events that are occurring there give confidence to those who regard a comparatively high price of cotton for years to come as inevitable. A long time must necessarily elapse before the Southern States can produce the article in anything approaching the quantities which existed before the war." It would thus seem that the South has very effectually dethroned, as far as they could, their idol—Cotton!

—— The number of houses pulled down in Paris during 1864 has been 256, and the number built 2,781; since 1852, 12,696 have been removed, and 03,925 new ones erected.

Chit-Chat.—The Cleveland Plaindealer mentions the case of a well-dressed young man of good manners, who gave in his income to the assessor at several thousand dollars, paid the tax, and had the pleasure of seeing his name in the lists among the nabobs of the country. On the strength of this he courted a wealthy man's daughter and married her. Then it was found out that he had no money, and had sold his mother's watch to pay the income-tax. The Government made a good thing out of it, and so did the young man.

—— A lady living in Woonsocket, Conn., aged 34 years, has father, mother, and four grandparents now living. Her father is aged 65 years, and her mother 60. The respective ages of her grandparents are as follows: 93, 91, 85, 82. No death has occurred in the family for 30 or 40 years.

—— FRANK LESLIE'S COMIC ALMANAC says there will be six eclipses this year—two of the sun, two of the moon—one of Jeff. Davis, and one of the rebellion.

—— That very learned man, Ernest de Bunsen, has written a book to prove that Adam and Zoroaster were one and the same man. This is about equal to Lamb saying it was easy to make the Chinese Fo into Noah. It was only putting N for F, and adding ah, and the thing was done.

—— A heavy sell was perpetrated in San Francisco recently. An extra, purporting to be issued from the office of the Alta, was hawked about and shouted through the streets. According to the slip, Grant had driven Lee into Richmond, and our troops were fighting their way through the streets, which were barricaded and defended by women, as well as men. Every house was a fortress, and hundreds of women and thousands of men were killed. Gen. Butler was mortally wounded by a shot fired from a window by a woman. There were some demonstrations of rejoicing, but they soon ceased, the police arresting the scamps for obtaining money under false pretences. The canard was printed at a job office.

—— Friday's New York Tribune says: "It is understood that Henry Ward Beecher asked and received from the Secretary of War permission to preach the Gospel in Charleston, in the ripeness of time. He expressed a particular desire to preach an election sermon in the cradle of the rebellion, on the occasion of Ben. Butler's assumption of the Governorship of South Carolina."

—— Mrs. Lincoln wore at her reception on Friday, Feb. 3d, a purple velvet dress, trimmed with white cord and buttons, an elegant white point lace shawl, head-dress of flowers and white lace, white kid gloves and fan.

—— The London aristocracy intend building a theatre for Sothern. This distinguished comedian is the author of the world-renowned conundrum, "Why does a dog waggle its tail?" The reply is, "Because the dog is larger than the tail, for if the tail were larger than the animal, the tail would waggle the dog," which is self-evident.

—— The Northampton Press says a business man in that town exercises his benevolence in distributing turkeys to his employees without much detriment to himself. If they can take the oath he will give each a turkey. But the oath is that they have not cheated him on time to an extent twice the value of the fowl. The oath is said to prove a regular ironclad, and thus he has kept his birds on the strength of it.

—— "Mary," asked Charles, "what animal dropped from the clouds?" "The rain, dear," was the whispered reply.

—— Carleton is about to issue a volume of poems by Mrs. Bolton—report speaks highly of them.

—— The 600th anniversary of Dante's birth will be celebrated in Florence next May.

—— It is stated that, while only five revolutionary pensioners are alive, there are 1,418 widows of such pensioners alive and drawing pensions.

—— Mr. Frank Lawler's letters from Richmond are so frequently intercepted that they cost the proprietors of the London Times on an average over £150, equal to $750 (gold) per letter. Rather expensive trash.

—— The Tribune now divides "the elbows of the Mincio" with the New York Daily Times, since in their issue of the 6th of Feb. they so ingeniously miscegenated the King of Prussia with Mr. Lincoln, that it required considerable sagacity to tell one from the other—like Dundreary the Tribune propounded a conundrum, "Why did Mr. Lincoln meet the rebel commissioners?"

—— The Daily News says, in reference to Mr. Wood's speech on the peace proposition, "We cannot disguise the fact that Mr. Wood stands to-day in antagonism with his own previous record, and has pronounced himself a coercionist to all intents and purposes."

PETROLEUM.—Responsible companies alone are to be found advertising in Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper. We call attention to the First National Petroleum Company of New York and Pennsylvania, whose claims are set forth in another column. The officers of the concern are gentlemen of character, whose names would not be lent to a doubtful undertaking.

THE wealthy and the noble, when they expend large sums in decorating their houses with the rare and costly efforts of genius, with busts from the chisel of a Canova, and with cartoons from the pencil of a Raphael, are to be commended, if they do not stand still here, but to go on to bestow some pains and cost, that the master himself be not inferior to the mansion, and that the owner be not the only thing that is little, amidst everything else that is great.

IN the Norwegian mines a singular custom is observed in paying the weekly wages of the men. The latter present themselves on Saturday evening to the inspector, who, having settled accounts with each, bids him turn round, and writes, in white chalk, upon his black back the sum due to him. Thus numbered, the man goes to the cashier, who also turns him round to look at the figures, and pays him, without saying a word.

SKETCHES IN SAVANNAH, GA.

The recent afflictions endured by Savannah are striking illustrations that the way of the transgressor is hard. In 1861 there was not a more beautiful, prosperous, or a prouder city in the South than the great seaport of Georgia. She has now thrice bowed her head in the dust—first to capture, then to want, and last of all to fire. Uncle Sam, whom she so foolishly forsook, has mercifully lightened two of the dispensations, and supplied her with food, and tempered his conquest with mercy. He will, doubtless, do all he can to assist her in the loss she has sustained in the recent conflagration. It is somewhat remarkable that both Charleston and Savannah have been scourged with the firebrand.

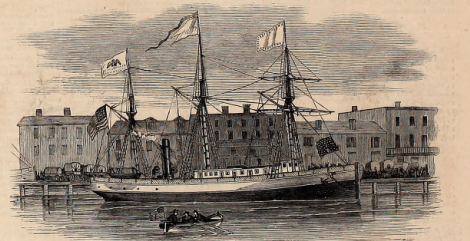
The Great Fire.



This commenced on the night of the 27th January, and raged for 18 hours—more or less—destroying over 200 houses, and causing the death of several persons, the exact number of which is not known at present, and perhaps never will be. That this fire was the result of incendiaries there can be no doubt, since a keg of powder was placed in close approximation to a magazine where nearly 60 tons were stored. Had this terrific mine exploded the once proud and rebellious city would have become a mere heap of ruins.

Among the chief features was the bursting of the shells, which flew through the air like unquiet spirits, scattering terror and frequently death in every direction.

The Savannah Republican says: "Pieces of shell were hurled through the air 200 feet, hissing in fearful tones. To form some idea of the danger it is only necessary to state that the streets and squares for a quarter of a mile around it e fire were filled with pieces of shell, many of which went tearing through the houses in a most horrible manner. The flashes upon the reddened sky were followed with awful explosions, the report of which must have been heard at least 15 or 20 miles. The suspense of our people was beyond all description, as the poor panic-stricken women and children huddled together behind huge trees and buildings for protection, some in an almost nude condition, shivering with the intense cold. The loud wails of terrified mothers who had missed their children in the dire confusion—the screams of children for their parents—the defiant roar of the flames that licked the sky—the ringing of the bells—the rushing of soldiers to and fro with crowds of citizens white with consternation—the spectral appearance of the entire city, whose doors seemed to rest in the fiery clouds that swept to and fro through the firmament—illuminating the city until each building stood out in brilliant grandeur like a vast panorama—all blended, formed a thrilling picture whose colors can never fade from the memory of those who beheld the remarkable spectacle. Several sturdy oak trees caught fire, and blazed away in a most singular manner. The large tank in the tower of the water reservoir was struck and pierced with a piece of shell, and poured down a cataract from the dizzy height, forming a picture of unequaled beauty as the silvery stream dashed over the iron railing that encircles the round stone tower. Nothing could be more beautiful than the long icicles which hung from the reservoir, resembling delicately tinged pink stalactites, while the trees were draped with boards of ice. The manner in which the fire brigade, all colored men, tried to do their duty was worthy of praise, but the rush of the water and the bursting of shells was too much for them, and they finally fled, abandoning their machines to the tender mercies of fire and water."

A spectator says: "Passing along West Broad street, we beheld a most revolting spectacle. On the sidewalk, in front of the smoking walls of a block of fine houses which were in ruins, lay the charred remains of a colored man, whom it is reported was first mortally wounded by a fragment of shell, and being unable to move, the flames devoured him, and left the sickening picture to tell his dreadful fate. Peering inside the walls we beheld the trunk of a human body and a few bones half buried in the hot ashes, while a crowd of insatiate curiosity-hunters stood with morbid satisfaction gazing at the nauseating sight.

A MOTHER'S PRAYER FOR HER SOLDIER BOY.

BY ADA YROOMAN.

FATHER! I kneel,
Not for myself, but for my boy, I pray!
Oh, nerve his soul upon the battle day,
And guide his steel.

My spirit bled,
'Twas almost death to say: "Go forth, my son!
And battle for the right. God's will be done."
But it was said!

Oh, God of Love!
To whom I nightly bend my knee in prayer,
To whom I bring my every woe and care—
Father, above!

Was it for this
I led his infant steps? for this I caught
Each gentle dawning of his baby thought—
And with a kiss

Of pride and joy
Stilled his childish prattlings?—oh! it seems Like a bright glimpse of long-forgotten dreams
—My boy!—my boy!

All Gracious Power!
Oh, let me see him ere I die! Once more
To this fond breast my darling child restore,
But for one hour!

And should he fall,
May guardian angels soothe his parting breath,
Whispering this comfort in the hour of death,
"'Twas duty's call!"

Such priceless blood
Must win thy smile—for if no sparrow dies
Unheeded by Thine ever pitying eyes,
Shall one so good?

E'en while I pray
My prayer is heard. The jubilant voice of bells
Upon my ear, my heart, my spirit swells—
It heralds day!

Thus says the voice:
"Freedom to all, from Florida to Maine;"
My gallant boy, you have not fought in vain!
Rejoice! rejoice!

O'er earth and sea!
Soldier of God! I'm proud to call thee son.
Father! I thank thee—now the victory's won!
My native land is free!

THE PHYSICIAN OF MONTPELIER.

BY GEORGE PERRY.

THE 9th of March, 1749, a postchaise, and three horses, all adust, descended, at a slow pace, the last slopes of the road from Lunel to Montpelier. When they had reached the foot of Mount Regret, where the city first becomes visible, the postilion, with a long cracking of his whip, crossed the Saladon, and stopped short before the hotel near the end of the bridge. Scarcely had the tinkling of the bells ceased when a gray-haired traveller put his head out the door of the coach, and demanded, in French, if that was the last relay-house.

"We passed it at Colombier," replied the postilion, gravely.

"Why does he stop, then?" murmured a sweet voice within the coach.

"Madame, it is to mend one of the traces and let the horses breathe a moment," replied the postilion.

He did not add that the accident occurred every day at the same place, and in accordance with secret understanding with the landlord of the Golden Cross, who had now already made his appearance, like a falcon for his prey. The traveller, a man with tawny wrinkled face, sinister expression, and dressed all in black, from his peruke even to his heavier shoes, with silver buckles, had alighted from the coach. The landlord obsequiously offered his services, but got in return only cross looks and abusive words. Nothing daunted, however, he went straight to the coach, and began again to extol the delights of his inn.

There were in the coach only a young lady in deep mourning and a servant. The lady was holding on her knees a child three or four years old, puny, feeble, pale and like a little wax figure beneath her long fair tresses. Awakened by the landlord's voice, the child opened its eyes, and a faint smile flitted across its features at sight of the peach boughs hanging, full of white and red blossoms, against the wall of the house. God has placed the most delicate divination in the mother's heart. She perceives the wants of the hopless little beings consigned to her charge before the latter even know them. Happy in being able to gratify the child's desire, the lady at once alighted from the coach, and went and sat down on the bench under the blooming trees, and near a stand loaded with refreshments, dried fruits, grapes, wines, cakes and Narbonne honey. While appearing full of business, hurtling about, cleaning his glasses, uncorking his bottles of Lunel wine, and arranging in proper order the various products of Languedoc, the old fox of the Golden Cross started a conversation in this wise:

"Eat, madame, and take courage. You are a the end now of all your troubles."

"What do you mean, my friend?" asked the mother, surprised.

"I mean, madame, that you will be happier when you pass this way again, turning your back on Montpelier."

"The Lord only knows what you mean. But are you aware, then, of my object in coming?"

"As well as if madame had put it down in black and white," replied the landlord, confidently, glancing towards the child. "You are come to consult M. Fizan."

"It seems, then, that this physician is in great esteem here."

"Oh, you may he certain of that, madame. If these horses could speak they would tell something, for he makes them run enough."

"It is said that no one is a prophet in his own country; what do they think of him here, in Montpelier?"

"Here, madame, he is looked up to as a god. Ask any one you like, everybody will tell you that, since the memory of man, no physician has ever equalled him."

"I should hope his knowledge were half as great as his reputation."

"Oh, his fame is nothing, madame, in comparison with his knowledge. He divines the malady sometimes without even seeing the patient."

"Indeed!"

"Yes. Not three weeks ago he was passing, in the evening, along the Faubourg Fils-Saint-Cely, up where you are going, he heard some one singing in an inn, he entered and asked who was the singer. They pointed him out, the doctor examined him an instant, and then said to the poor fellow, 'Go, put yourself at once in bed.' When he had gone, the doctor shook his head and said, 'He is a dead man.' The day after——"

"Well, what then?"

"They buried him."

"Did he not cure him?" asked a blunt, rough voice behind the landlord.

It was the traveller in black.

"No, monsieur, because it was impossible. When once anything is broken in the body no one can mend it. But he has saved thousands of others, as he will save, I am sure, this charming little child of yours."

The traveller shrugged his shoulders, drank off two glasses of Muscat in succession, and paying for them with an ill grace, took his place in the coach without another word. The lady had already preceded him, and with mingled joy and impatience was clasping the child to her bosom. An hour later she was installed in one of the grand apartments of the Cheval-Blanc, and the landlady herself announced M. Fizes. As she heard this name, as famous then in Paris as in Montpelier, she turned pale and trembled. But her surprise was greater than her emotion. Instead of the savant which her imagination had pictured to her, with the antique masque of Hippocrates, or with the imposing gravity, the peruke and robe of the colleague of Guy Patin, she saw before her a simple, easy man of fifty, short, stout, with loose flowing hair, and whom, with his great shoes adorned with silver buckles, and his gray coat, she would sooner taken for the steward than for the oracle of the faculty of medicine. His features, ordinary as a peasant's, had an expression of bluntness which was far from being prepossessing. But if one caught his first glance and observed him closely, he could not fail to be struck with the character expressed in his rustic physiognomy, and especially with the depth and penetration of his glance.

Smiling good-naturedly at the lady's astonishment, he took the child and laid it on his knees, and after a few minutes' examination, interspersed with affectionate caressings, like those of a bear playing with a squirrel, he gave it back calmly to its mother.

It was for her a moment of silence and heart-rending anxiety. With eager eye she questioned that impassive countenance. Unable to contain herself any longer, her hand on her heart to repress its beating, she cried, with a gasp:

"Oh, monsieur, I conjure you, leave me no longer in this terrible suspense."

M. Fizes looked at her, and spoke a few words in patois to the landlady.

"Well?" asked the mother, almost breathless.

The landlady replied with a smile of joy, and threw herself into the lady's arms.

"Two mothers!" muttered M. Fizes, pulling out a great blue figured handkerchief.

The mother interrupted his soliloquy, flinging herself down at his knees, overcome with joy, and saying, while he awkwardly lifted her up:

"Is it true? Is it true, monsieur, that you will save my child? Oh, repeat it to me, I beg you; let me hear it—let me hear it again—lest I fall back into despair!"

"Madame," stammered M. Fizes, not without difficulty, "you have performed a double miracle t o-day. You have, in the first place, made me shed tears, contrary to my custom; and now," added he, in a half-vexed tone, "you make me murder French, a thing which I do not do once in ten years; for at present I speak but two languages, patois with my patients and Latin with students and savants."

"Speak to me in whatever you please; but in your answer just now was I mistaken in what I thought I understood?"

"No."

"You think, then, you can cure my little boy?"

"Yes."

At this word the mother's strength gave way, and she would have fallen had not the doctor caught her with his great hand. After having intrusted her to the care of the landlady, he abruptly seized his cane and rushed forth, crying out on the stairway, in one of the roughest of voices:

"Have the child sat! I shall be back in the evening."

One of his brother physicians, who wished to take him to see a patient, endeavored to stop him at the door, but M. Fizes, with his usual refrain, "No time! no time!" pushed by, and quickening his steps, was soon out of the city, wandering along on the banks of the Lez.

It was not a prudent thing, at that day especially, to ramble along the right bank. The mall players held the ground by a right of possession, dating back several centuries. The balls, hurled with force a distance of fifty or sixty paces, crossed in the air in every direction, and in spite of the constant cries of "Look out!" it required a vigilant eye, a watchful ear and light foot to avoid an accident. Had it not been for the respect in which he was held, M. Fizes, plunging, with his head down, into the midst of the games, like a bull into a circus, would have risked losing his life; but the players all knew him by heart, and as they were well aware that he would listen to nobody, and would go wherever he pleased, they suspended their games till he had got past into the meadows of the Laine. Never had he appeared more absent-minded or pre-occupied. Straying carelessly across the meadows, where even in spring rocks are more abundant than flowers, he turned towards the river and began slowly to reascend, looking at the green waters of the Lez, the rushes and the young willows gleaming in the sun, with all the minute attention of a frogcatcher. He had almost reached Juvenal Bridge, whose gray arches already appeared through the foliage, when he stopped and stood fixed like a column before a little cottage hidden in the olive foliage, close beside the road. Spring had hung the modest dwelling from base to ridge with its tapestries of flowers and verdure; the stones of the wall had disappeared under convolvulus and honeysuckle; the tiles, overgrown with moss and grass, were scarcely visible through the silvery borders of Easter daisies and pellitory. From this nest, lighted up with the streaming sunbeams, came a fresh youthful voice, which seemed to fascinate M. Fizes. By the sweet emotion expressed on his countenance, one could see that he was not detecting an aneurism, as in the Faubourg Pila-Saint-Gely. Motionless, with both hands resting on his cane, he listened, all absorbed, to the linnet who was singing close by him, yet unconscious of his presence, a translation of the triolet of Jacques:

> "Le premier jour du mois de Mai
> Fut le plus heureux de ma vie,
> Je vous vis et je vois aimai
> Le premier jour du mois de Mai."

"That odd Jacques Rancliert!" muttered M. Fizes, when the singer paused, "he would not be a physician like his grandfather, but what he did was worth something after all. However, the songster makes more than half the song. I would give my Flauquerques vineyard to hear it once more."

The doctor's hope was disappointed; he listened, but heard only the noise of the mill, which was occasionally quashing some hard substance. Taking a bold resolution, he went direct to the door of the little shop, and found himself face to face with a young girl polishing jet. She recognised him at once, and leaving her wheel hastened to offer him a chair. M. Fizes seated himself, and she resumed her work and turning her wheel with a nimble foot and polishing her jet, started at once into a conversation. Our savant let her talk, and listened apparently with lively interest, but in reality without catching a word of what she said. While she was asking if there were many sick in Montpelier, if he had come to visit some one in the neighborhood, if he thought the fevers would prevail that year, he, with his chin resting on his cane, looked at her eagerly, and said to himself with a pleased, naive surprise, that he had never seen a whiter arm, a more slender hand, a more finely shaped figure, an eye more black, a prettier mouth, a face more charming.

The girl, disquieted by his silence, and perhaps also by his fixed look, asked him if he felt ill.

"Hum! why that question, my little dear?" said he, abruptly straightening himself up.

"Because I had heard said that M. Fizes has the measles."

"Is my face red then?"

"Like the rhododendron, that great flower in the Jardin des Plantes."

"That is because I am warm, my darling. In faith, I never felt better in my life."

"How glad I am! It is fortunate, especially for the poor; what should we do without you?"

"You love me then, you folks?"

"Oh, you may well believe it. After the good God."

"What is your name, my daughter?"

"Rosette, at your service, monsieur."

"What does your father do?"

"Alas! he is dead, and can but pray for his poor widow and child."

"Rosette," said the doctor, rising, and resuming instinctively the gruff tone which he affected on occasions of performing a good deed, "if you ever need anything at home, you know where to find me."

"How kind you are!" cried she, with tears in her eyes, and seizing both his hands and kissing them in spite of his resistance. "Thanks, Monsieur Fizes, thanks a thousand times! But, provided God continues my health, with this trade I am rich."

"How much do you earn a day?"

"Twenty-five sous."

"And are you contented?"

"As a queen, Monsieur Fizes, especially when there are violets."

"Good-bye, good-bye," said the doctor, hurrying away with his Basque strides and without turning his head to the right or left.

Arriving at the Juvenal Bridge, M. Fizes had to take breath. He would probably have launched off into the region of dreams in continuing his course, had not an unexpected encounter detained him on the banks of the Lez. As he was passing the mill, he heard a voice calling to him unceremoniously and in a most familiar tone.

"Who calls me?" cried he, with vexation.

"Who? A friend, Antoine, your best friend!" answered a gay voice, and almost simultaneously the doctor espied a sort of rustic Falstaff issuing from the mill, white from head to foot, with the exception of his face, which shone like a firebrand.

"Good day, Nicholas, what do you want?"

"A grip of your hand, holy faith! and to tell you a bit of good fortune. Oh! you wished to slip off without being seen! I was peering on you, and I have got you in my net, my good fellow!"

"How? You saw me?"

"Yes, down there with Rosette. Beautiful girl, is she not, Antoine?"

"I shall not deny it."

"Holy faith! I believe it. However the whole faculty might hold the contrary, and the deuce take them, if the beadle would only listen to reason."

"Oh, oh, I see there is a dangerous rivalry! You wish to marry the girl?"

"Yes, at the grand altar of Saint Peter's."

"But, unfortunate man, you are crazy; at your age?"

"My dear sir, I shall be only sixty, in midsummer, and she is now going on nineteen."

"What a slight difference! But then you have nothing, or next to nothing."

"No! nothing but my mule, which, by the way, is now a little ailing."

"Then, I tell you again, that you would better get a physician than a wife."

"There is a remedy for everything, Antoine, except death, and could I call on you when things come to the worst, I am sure you would save me?"

"Eh! Who knows, if you cried loud and long enough. But I should like to know what means you are going to employ to marry Rosette."

"Means which always succeed. How do you do when you wish to go on the left bank of the Lez?"

"I take the bridge."

"Well, that is precisely the means I employ. Only, my friend, I pass on a golden bridge."

"Bah! as you have not a cent!"

"Now, but before three months I shall be richer than you or the collector of excise."

"You expect, then, an inheritance from Peru?"

"Let us sit down," said Nicholas, settling himself on an old mill stone, half embedded in the sand under an old oak. M. Fizes, who was credulous as a boy, had always an open ear for histories of marvels, and he took a seat eagerly beside the miller. The latter, looking neither to the right or left, began in a mysterious voice:

"It is a great secret, my friend, which I am about to confide to you; but swear to me that you will never disclose it."

"I swear, Nicholas, by the mantle of Rabelais!"

"Good! you are acquainted with Castelnau?"

"As well as with my Flauquerques vineyard."

"Have you observed the rock which lifts its nose out of the water near the bank of the Lez?"

"Certainly, it is very plain in times of drouth."

"That, at any rate, is a rock!"

"I can find a score as black as that in less than a league."

"I mean that is a rock of virtue and value. In short, if I could, holy faith, I would put it in my pocket. Knowing it as I do, I should be very careful not to pass it, without taking off my hat."

"Hem! you are very civil!"

"You have noticed how swollen it is? Would to God, my friend, that my pockets contained a quarter of what there is in it."

"What would you do with so many precious stones?"

"Just look at it then! You imagine that is a mere rock like the others!"

"Hem! It appears so."

"There is where you are deceived, Antoine. If the outside has nothing extraordinary, the inside is crammed with gold and silver."

"Indeed!"

"Yes, that rock is the rock Substantium, the old city. Every year, the 23d of June, at midnight, the river opens and there is to be seen a good street leading out to the rock. A spirit then issues out of the rock all clothed in black. He comes and stations himself before the gate, and cries out in French, with a terrible voice, 'By command of the great hunter.' You reply to him in the same tongue: 'Here am I.' He says: 'Who wishes money?' 'Give it me!' you reply. The spirit then says: 'Enter!' Thereupon you take the path opened through the water and you enter the rock."

"And once inside?" asked the doctor, delighted with the legend.

"You find first a huge pile of farthings, but silly is he who stops for them! farther on are pennies, and then heaps of all sorts of money. If you continue, you find also new crowns and gold sovereigns. There is where a sensible man stops!"

"So then the 23d of June you will go to Castelnau?"

"Yes," said the old miller; "but there is one thing worries me."

"What is it, Nicholas?"

"It is that there is only just one hour to remain down there. If I miscalculate the time, if I mistake the exact minute, I cannot go out till the end of the year, and then with empty hands. It is a quarter of a league to the sovereigns, and over a very tortuous road, and if in groping back with my load I should happen to stumble and stray a little from the path, I remain a year there without eating or drinking. That is the reason why all those who come away are nothing but skin and bone."

"Love will give you courage. But I greatly fear, friend Nicholas, that you will not espouse Rosette, if the rock of Substantium has to furnish the dowry."

Thereupon they separated, the miller, full of faith, returned to the mill, and M. Fizes took the route of the gate of Lattes to Montpelier.

Walking along in the wind, fragrant with the odors of olive trees, oaks and plantains, the doctor, drawing in deep breaths, fell to analysing like a mathematician or physologist his new sentiments.

"Strange power," said he, "of that nature which, not to shock my curé, I call the vital principle. It brings to my mind that passage in Genesis with a family scene which thrills every fibre of my heart. And now, when I seek the cause of this sudden perturbation, it shows me also a remedy on the banks of the Lez. But I had a serious misgiving there, and by means of Nicholas, nature—excellent mother—relieves me of both. Evidently, if a man of sixty dares think of marrying a girl of twenty, it would not be wholly absurd in me who am only fifty."

Charmed with this reasoning, the doctor commenced his round of professional calls, ending them at the Cheval-Blanc before sunset—for he always retired, at least from the public, with the setting of that luminary—and his door once closed would not open to the importunity of the greatest dignitaries of the city. He found his little patient asleep, and the mother watching at the bedside. After examining the child, he reassured the lady of the favorable symptoms, and urged her strongly, for the sake of her health, to profit by this opportunity to obtain a few hours rest for herself. But raising her head, and fixing her eyes upon him:

"While my child lives," said she, "I will not quit his chamber."

"But you may do so, madame, without any danger."

"No, monsieur, I cannot."

"Hem! Then there must be something that I am not aware of?"

The lady, walking on tiptoe, listened at every door, then seizing the doctor's hand, she drew him into the farthest recess of the window, and said, in a suppressed tone:

"Physicians are the confessors of families. If I confide to you a secret?"

"It will be kept conscientiously sacred, madame."

"Know then the horror of my situation. Monsieur De Montolieu, my husband, was of my age, and we loved each other. Everything seemed to smile on us. Alas! happiness is like fortune. His brother—you saw him here—snatched by his kindness from penury, entered our household a year ago. A few days afterwards I was a widow."

"And you suspect this brother?"

"He poisoned him."

"Devil! I comprehend, then, your fears for the child."

"I watch night and day to protect him, for the wretch has already made one attempt. But for that the dear little angel would still resemble this portrait."

The doctor took a miniature representing the child with bright eyes and rosy cheeks, and was contemplating it pensively, when the person of whom they were speaking entered the room without rapping. Fixing upon him at once his penetrating eye, the doctor disconcerted him in spite of his audacity.

"You are in consultation here," stammered the man, with embarrassment, "I will retire."

"Please remain, monsieur," replied the doctor coldly; "you are the head of the family, and as such it is my duty to state what I have to say in your presence."

"What is the subject you are considering?" asked the brother-in-law, more and more agitated.

"It is a matter which closely concerns you. When you entered, I was saying to madame that some poisonous substance must have been administered to this child."

"And on what supposition?"

"Science does not suppose, it ascertains and affirms. You would comprehend me, moreover, if I told you my reasons, for you are not destitute, I believe, of chemical knowledge."

"And on what do you base your conjecture, monsieur?"

"On your connection with Montet, demonstrator of the faculty, in whose company I have sometimes met you."

Monsieur De Montolieu was so confounded by this home thrust, that he tottered and was forced to steady himself on a chair. The lady and Monsieur Fizes exchanged glances, and the latter continued:

"I have assured madame of the child's recovery, and if he dies in Montpelier medical science will open the eyes of justice."

Leaving him under the effect of these menacing words, he took leave of the widow, and returned home on foot to his house in the Place de la Canourgue, where he found awaiting him in his dining-hall some friends of an education and position inferior to his own—for by nature he was of the people from head to foot—and sought and enjoyed only the society of such plain men. The table was the sole pleasure and relaxation of his sad laborious life. He took his place light-heartedly with the rest, and remained till the hammer of the great clock struck ten times moaningly. When the last vibration died away, the doctor was already in his vast, high-post bed, enclosed with curtains of blue serge, and in less than an hour was dreaming that the child of Madame De Montolieu was again bright-eyed and rosy-cheeked as in the minature, and that Rosette, quitting her cottage embowered under the olive trees on the banks of the Lez, came to gladden with her youth and beauty the old mansion in the Place de la Canourgue.

Nearly two months, the happiest of the worthy doctor's life, flew by like almond flowers in the breath of these illusions. But happiness never lasts; it is like those landscapes of the Pyrenees that change beneath the spectator's gaze before he has time scarcely to turn away.

One evening, when with a joyous heart he was walking along the banks of the Lez, with the resolution formed and deferred a hundred times to take his fortune and name in both hands and lay them at the feet of Rosette, he perceived her signaling to him impatiently to hasten his coming. Nothing was lacking to dissipate in an instant all vacillation. But more timid than a boy, this lover of fifty soon began to slacken his pace, and the hesitations returned and throttled him so vigorously, that when he reached the cottage he was more agitated and less courageous than ever. His embarrassment was manifest, but preoccupied with other thoughts doubtless, Rosette did not notice it. Scarcely giving him time to breathe:

"Monsieur Fizes," said she, with a silvery voice, and tapping the ground with her little foot, "you who are so learned, could you not read a letter for me written in French, and tell me what it contains?"

"Hum! yes, my little dear, I could do that."

"Here is the letter."

The doctor took a big packet of bluish, ridgy paper, bearing the postmark of Brest, and opened it with a somewhat unsteady hand, and scarcely had he glanced over the first lines when he changed color, and supported himself like a drunken man against one of the posts of the shop.

"Ah! monsieur," cried Rosette, with lively anxiety, "it is bad news."

"No! no! little dear, far from that, it is very good for you!"

"Then you are unwell?"

"Nothing, a simple dizziness! Go fetch me some water!"

Monsieur Fizes drank slowly, and returned the glass.

"Who is this Marcel?" asked he in a low voice.

"A very worthy, kind lad, Monsieur Fizes. If the king did not need him on the ships, as they say, we should be married, established in Cabanas, and instead of coursing the seas he would be supporting his family as before with his nets."

The doctor felt an oppression, and unbuttoned his waistcoat of ribbed velvet.

"You are in pain, Monsieur Fizes?"

"Yes, Rosette, I need air. Good-bye till to-morrow, or some other day."

"You are going without telling me what is in my letter!"

"True! I am so absent-minded! He writes that he has obtained a temporary leave of absence, and that you will see him soon."

"Is it possible!" cried Rosette, clapping her hands for joy.

Monsieur Fizes wished to hear no more; he made good his escape across the fields and meadows of the Laine, and such was the rapidity of his course, that the messenger from the Cheval-Blanc, a lightfooted lad of twenty years, who had come in quest of him, was barely able to overtake him by the canal. The doctor, wearied and vexed with the cries of his pursuer, turned back on him like a wild boar, his cane aloft in the air.

"Oh, quick! Monsieur Fizes, quick to the hotel!" cried the lad, with Southern familiarity.

"The deuce take you and that too! I have not time."

"It is for the lady's child!"

"Hey! what is it you say?"

"I say the child will be lucky if you find it alive!"

"What has happened? It was better this morning."

"I don't know; but I saw it in its last agonies."

"That must be so; yes, he must have succeeded," muttered Monsieur Fizes. "Misfortunes never come alone. There are days in life fatally unlucky. But if the man has been worsted, the doctor knows how to be avenged."

Muttering these words between his teeth, he turned back, and proceeded in great haste to the Cheval-Blanc. Madame De Montolieu was awaiting him impatiently. Seeing him, she gave vent to her sorrow:

"He has succeeded this time, the scoundrel!" cried she, sobbing. "My child, my child is dead!"

"We will see as to that," said Monsieur Fizes.

He went to the child, gave it, little by little, some spoonfulls of a potion which he had provided himself with at an apothecary's, and after an hour's attentions, drawing gently the curtains, and taking up his three-cornered hat:

"Let the child sleep," said he, "there is no further danger."

Madame de Montolien wept and covered his hands with kisses.

"It is not the time for that," said he, as blunt as he was kind. "How did the man do it?"

"He took advantage of a moment's absence. I had just stepped into the parlor, the door remained open. What he threw into the glass I know not. As quick as I came back I snatched it from the child's hands; but too late! he had already begun to suffer."

"Hem! There must be a stop to this," said M. Fizes to himself, with a stamp of the foot.

"Believe me, I should have written before this to the public prosecutor, were I not in this horrible dilemma of seeing my son murdered before my eyes, or bringing eternal disgrace on my husband's name."

"Be assured, madame, that can all be properly arranged. But it is necessary to act with decision and vigor. Have you kept the glass which contained the poisonous substance?"

Madame de Montolien ran to her bureau and brought a glass, still about two-thirds full. The doctor giving a glance at it, put a drop on his tongue.

"Yes, I am right," said he, "it is verdigris."

"Put it away quick, monsieur, he is coming!"

"Oh! it is he returning!"

"He comes to lunch."

"That table in the parlor is, then, for him?"

"Yes; what will you do?"

"Prevent a crime, madame, and save your child."

Madame de Montolien turned pale, her strength gave way, she sank almost unconscious into a chair, while the doctor carrying the glass, passed into the parlor, where M. Montolieu found him standing in his usual posture, with his hands resting on his cane.

Feigning at once alarm:

"Is the child worse?" asked the guilty man in a hypocritical tone.

"I was wanting to speak to you about this very thing!"

"Proceed, doctor."

"Well," said M. Fizes, seating himself, "as you must have foreseen for a long time what has just happened, the blow will be less grievous to you."

"Yes, I must avow I have been prepared for it a year at least. The child was too frail. It could not live. Alas!" added he, sitting down at the table, and pouring out a generous glass of muscatel, "the child is not the one to be most pitied!"

"I agree with you, monsieur."

"I am very anxious for my unfortunate sister-in-law."

"You, then, entertain a project," uttered M. Fizes, with his bluntest tone, "of giving her also verdigris."

"What do you mean?" stammered the guilty man, livid and overwhelmed.

"I mean that you poisoned your nephew! with filings of the copper plates which Montet sold you last evening."

"Monsieur!"

"We know all about it! Was it not you who gave my patient drink just now?"

"It was only sweetened water!"

"Will you swear to that, before God?"

"Yes," said the poisoner, averting his looks.

"So much the better! if that is so, you relieve me from a terrible remorse."

"A terrible remorse!" repeated De Montolieu, with a real anxiety.

"Yes, indeed! Why should I not confess it? I wished to try an experiment; in order to assure myself that the conjecture was correct, I put the remainder of the sweetened water in your muscatel!"

"Heaven help me!"

"Oh, you would not swear before God, now?"

The prisoner was a hideous sight to behold. The features livid and distorted, his bristling hair, everything about him bore the triple imprint of crime, terror and retribution. Helpless, incapable of speech, he shivered in his chair, his glassy eyes fixed on M. Fizes.

This terror and cowardice moved the doctor's pity.

"I might save you," said he, shrugging his shoulders, "but you deserve neither pardon nor commiseration."

The guilty man summoned up all his strength, and threw himself at the doctor's feet.

"Listen, and decide quickly, for there is not an instant to lose," continued the doctor, solemnly "I can save you, I repeat, but it will be on two conditions: first, that you write and sign for me an avowal of your crime; second, that by eight o'clock this night you set out for Spain, and that an exile, which shall end only with your life, shall expiate the murder you have committed and the murder you have premeditated."

Notwithstanding his terror and his love of life, the wretch seemed to hesitate. M. Fizes, who had already placed the ink and paper on the table, put on his three-cornered hat, and started to go away. He had reached the door, and his hand was on the latch, when the despairing man called him back:

"I consent to the exile," whispered he.

"That is not enough; I must have the rest."

"But why!"

"To deliver you up to justice, should you ever return to France."

"No! no! I will die rather!"

"Then you may order your coffin at once, for in an hour you will be stretched out stiff!"

De Montolieu sprang to his feet at these words:

"And if I write this," said he, "will you swear on your honor that it shall never pass out of your keeping?"

"Yes, on the honor of a man of honor, as long as you keep your oath."

"And can you save me?"

"Yes, it is still possible, but, zounds! there is not another minute to wait!"

De Montolieu seized the pen and wrote for dear life. At the same time the doctor poured out a whitish powder into a cup of water; when both had finished, he took the paper, and gave De Montelieu the potion.

"Have no fear!" said the doctor, putting the paper in his pocket; "set out instantly, but never set foot again in France, else beware the gibbet!"

De Montolieu set out that evening as he agreed. M. Fizes explained to Madame de Montolieu how this sudden riddance had been effected, acknowledging confidentially that he had put nothing in the muscatel.

"The threats would suffice if he was guilty," said he, "for I was certain that imagination would do the rest."

If the consciousness of having done a beneficent deed, and the gratitude of true hearts are the best reward, the most precious recompense of a good man, M. Fizes was paid a hundred fold. That mother afterwards so happy, thanks to him alone, in quitting Montpelier with her child fresh and rosy as a cherub, bathed his hand with grateful tears, and would have given him her whole fortune. More scrupulous this time than was his wont with rich patrons, he consented to accept only a little casket of ebony, which he judged of sufficient value to pay his regular fees.

Just at the time he was receiving, not without emotion, this souvenir in his study, together with the last adieus of the widow and her child, his old housekeeper announced an arrival which caused him a far more serious perturbation. It was Rosette and her mother, dressed out in Sunday attire, and arrayed as if going to the fête of Pignan.

Astonished as well as delighted by their unexpected appearance, he made them sit down in the midst of his folios, and asked in a gay tone what good wind had brought them to the Place de la Canourgue.

"I have come to ask of you a favor," said Rosette, casting her eyes downward, and blushing deeply.

"Hem! a favor of me?"

"Yes, I hope you will grant it me."

"If I can, certainly; you have a good chance."

Rosette then informed him, that Marcel, on the day he was expecting to profit by his leave of absence, had received an order to embark on the frigate La Gloire, to convey troops to India. He would have to go unless he could obtain a thousand francs, the sum demanded for his discharge.

"Now," added Rosette, with tears in her eyes, I have only six hundred francs in my purse."

"And you wish, do you not, to borrow the surplus?"

"Oh! M. Fizes, how kind you are! I will work night and day to repay you!"

"Hem! Speak to me now sincerely, as if at the confessional; do you really love this fisherman of Cabanas much?"

"Oh! yes; ask my mother!"

"Perhaps I could offer you a better match, a man who has a true heart and chests full of money, a great physician, like myself, one whom everybody esteems, and who loves you to distraction without your knowing it."

"Who is it?" asked the mother, excited.

"Antoine Fizes!"

"You!" cried Rosette, starting back with surprise, while the mother raised her eyes gratefully to heaven, and wept for joy.

"Yes, myself."

"Oh! I am very sorry, Monsieur Fizes, for I love you also, but in an another manner. It is not your fortune or your name that would influence me, if my heart were not already another's; it is your sincere character and your kind heartedness. You, who are so good to the poor, know better than I am able to express why our love is to us the greatest of treasures. We have no other riches. If I took back my heart from Marcel, what would he have left? That is all he has in the world."

"Then remain faithful to him, Rosette," said M. Fizes, sobbing like a child, "and may he bring you as great a happiness as I, old fool, desire for you."

Putting into her hand the ebony casket with a hundred gold louis in it, which he had just received from M. de Montolien, he drove the mother and daughter off, as it were, with his accustomed bluntness, refusing to hear a word about reimbursement.

Thereafter he occasionally extended his solitary promenades to Cabanas, where Rosette and her sailor were settled, contenting himself with a distant view, and quickly disappearing as soon as he perceived he was recognised.

His love for Rosette was, it was said, the only weak spot in his philosophical armor, still he was more to be envied than his poor friend, Nicholas, who did not fail to watch, on the 23d of June, at midnight on the banks of the Lez, but without seeing the spirit of the rock Substantium.

FEBRUARY 2, 1865.

Ay, ring out joyously, ye bells!
And peal it from the cannon's mouth—
Free as God's Heaven from North to South—
No slave in our Republic dwells!

Look upward, eyes, through happy tears!
Blessed indeed are we who see
The day that makes a nation free!
God's kingdom comes, though slow our years.

Beat fast, exultingly, oh heart!—
Thy every throb a grateful prayer—
Banish each selfish grief and care,
And in thy country's joy bear part!

Oh soul rejoice, as ne'er before!
Forsaken by him "a little while,"
God gathers with a gracious smile,
And mercies great, this land once more!

Oh People! to His love restor'd!
Let every living tongue awake—
The words the adoring Mary spake:
"My soul doth magnify the Lord!"

GRAND MASQUERADE BALL OF THE ARION SINGING SOCIETY.

This annual festival was held for the present year at the Academy of Music, and if a company of 7,000 persons can insure the success of a ball, this may be allowed to have been brilliant beyond all precedent.

The Arion was started in the winter of 1853 by a number of the younger members of the famous Liederkranz Society, most of whom came from the borders of the Rhine, from among a people widely celebrated for the joviality and sociability. Popular favor has been showered upon the Arion Society in an almost unprecedented manner, so much so that a charter of incorporation has just been granted to it, which places it in a very favorable financial position.

The present officers of the society are the following: C. Triscca, President; F. Kamm, Vice-President; C. Baeder, Albert Strathmann and J. D. A. Mensing, Secretaries; F. Waibel, Treasurer, and W. Edler, Librarian.

Immediately after New Year's a club is annually formed within the society, in which, after the fashion in vogue in Cologne and Mayence, the most unbounded fun is indulged in. This year Mr. C. Buchheister presided over this club, and from that body all the fun of the evening is got up.

The carnival, after a number of rehearsals, culminated finally at the Academy, on the night of Feb. 9.

The decorations were not so profuse as at the ball held last winter, although the tasteful distribution of vari-colored flags and banners around the several balconies and over the heads of the masqueraders presented a very striking picture, which glowed with great brilliance in the stream of light which flowed from thousands of gas jets. At the extreme end of the room there was a transparency as follows:

Star. ARION. Star.
Lute.
Wreath of Laurel.

There were also various pictured banners hung in front of the upper balcony, prominent among which was a veritable portrait of Arion himself, which attracted much attention. Suspended from the centre of the dome and down to within five or six feet of the heads of the fantastic multitude was a large balloon, radiant with all the gorgeousness of the red, white and blue. Festoons of flowers were strung in front of the balconies, and added much to the beauty of the decorative display.

Around the proscenium boxes were placed six straw-stuffed figures, attired in every possible fancy dress, and giving the place a very odd appearance, looking altogether incompatible with the usual ceremonial appearance of the house.

About half-past nine o'clock the promenade band, led by M. E. Dietz, commenced playing a march, to the step of which the promenade was formed, headed by the Floor Committee in charge of Capt. Caudedus, and composed of Messrs. Olchenbach, Winkhaus, Reichelt, Herder, Marquardt, Steinway, Landmann, Kuendahl, Poppe and Hook, who were dressed as musketeers of the queen, of the time of Louis XIII., of France; the procession then moved around the large hall.

As soon as the grand entrée of masquerading had taken place, the terpsichorean exercises of the evening were inaugurated. The scene now presented was one of magnificent ludicrousness, if we may use such a paradoxical phrase. The Devil led off with Columbine, while a huge and savage-looking North American Indian accompanied a lively Spanish senorite through the whirling waltz. A number of impudent harlequins kept themselves busy by slapping everybody they came in contact with, with their industrious weapon of magic steel.

The press was fully represented, not only in an army of editors and reporters, but in dress, one lady, Mrs. Newcombe, appearing costumed in the New York Herald, made up in a dress, jockey hat and feather composed of Heralds. She attracted universal attention, and was attended by Mrs. Parker, in Highland costume. Walking demijohns, negro minstrels, Irish bootblacks, Punch and Judy, peasant girls, troubadours, military men, civilians, walking dolls and dancing jacks, abounded on every side. During the festivities the immense audience were astonished by the appearance of eight Arions, costumed as frogs, who performed a quadrille to the intense delight of all parties.

Our Artist has sketched them as they emerged from their habitation in the so-called United States Treasury.

At 12 o'clock, the clatter of the tin pots announced the entrée of the Knights of the Oval Circle, 12 knights dressed in blouses, with silver helmets, who, preceded by a martial band playing on tin kettles, and headed by a standard-bearer with their standard, marched around the hall singing a song, of which we give the following few stanzas:

The standard bearer, lion heart,
A palladium of the right knight,
He came with his oval legs
Directly from the Custom-House.

Even Napoleon the Little is here.
He has but one fault,
He is, notwithstanding the Empire is peace,
A great fighter and brawler.

THE KNIGHTS OF THE OVAL CIRCLE.

The men who at the last year's ball
As sulphur band were active
To-night appear before you gay,
Virtuous, purified and good.

A little later a large balloon, which was suspended all evening from the ceiling, exploded, showering down a liberal supply of shinplasters from the Confederacy, and exhibiting a big female head funnily painted up in gaudy colors, much to the merriment of the crowd.

This affair was arranged by Mr. Buchheister, and reflects much credit upon its inventor.

A Commus or student's gathering was afterwards arranged by the committee. This consisted of a drinking scene, varied, for the time, by the appearance of Salamanders on the table.

The social pleasures of the evening were marred by nothing, unless the vast and confusing crowd of happy folks may be considered as in itself a drawback; the pecuniary success of the enterprise is understood to have been very fair. Two thousand tickets were sold, netting $10,000.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

"Put money in thy purse," as the pick-pocket said when he robbed a man of an empty one.

The failure of the Dutch Gap canal has proved "a blessing in disguise." If the rebel fleet had found it open they would have been able to commit great devastation.

"Stranger, I want to leave my dog in this 'ere office till the boat starts: but I'm afraid somebody will steal him."

"You can't do it," said the clerk; "take him out."

"Well, stranger, that is cruel; but you are dispositioned alike, and he is kinder company for you."

"Take him out!" roared the clerk.

"Well, stranger, I don't think you're honest, and you want watching. Here, Dragon!" he said to the dog, "sit down here and watch that fellow sharp!" And turning on his heel, said, "Put him out, stranger, if he's troublesome."

The dog lay there till the boat started, watching and growling at every movement of the clerk, who gave him the better part of the office.

A rich petroleum operator, gaunt as a skeleton and ignorant as a hodman, went to an artist the other day to have his portrait taken.

"Will you have it taken in oil or water-colors?" inquired the artist.

"Ile, of course," replied he. "It comes to me more natural; and, besides, it makes me look fatter."

Why is the rebel General in Tennessee like a winter article of ladies' wear? Because he's a worsted Hood.

"Jim, I believe Samho's got no truth in him."

"You don't know; dere's more truth in dat nigger dan all the rest on de plantation."

"How do you make dat?"

"Why, he nebber lets any out."

A clergyman at Cambridge preached a sermon, which one of his auditors commended.

"Yes," said the gentleman to whom it was mentioned, "it was a good sermon, but he stole it."

This was repeated to the preacher. He resented it, and called on the gentleman to retract.

"I am not," replied the aggressor, "very apt to retract my words; but in this instance I will. I said you had stolen the sermon. I find I was wrong; for, on returning home and referring to the book whence I thought it was taken, I found it was there."

The siege of Nashville was the occasion of some laughable incidents, as the following paragraph from a correspondence written in that city shows:

During the skirmish in the little reconnoissance made by Gen. Steedman on our left, a couple of soldiers of the colored brigade came upon three rebels, whose guns were unloaded, and demanded their surrender. One of the Johnnies indignantly refused to surrender to a "d—d nigger."

"Berry sorry, massa," said Sambo, bringing his piece to a "ready;" "but we's in a great hurry, and hain't got no time to send for a white man."

The ominous click that accompanied this remark brought the scion of chivalry to time, and he was brought in, crying and swearing all the way that his father would kill him if he ever heard that he had surrendered to a nigger.

"If you go on in that way, sir," said the prisoner in the dock to his counsel who was defending him with force and fury, and abusing judge and jury in good set terms, "if you go on in that way, sir, they'll hang me, I know they will."

"Never mind, my boy," replied the counsel, an Irish gentleman, carried away by his own eloquence, "never mind, my boy; let them hang you, and I'll make them repent it."

One Sunday, as a little girl was on the way home from church, with her father, they passed a boy splitting wood, when the father said:

"Mary, do you see that boy breaking the Sabbath?"

She made no reply, but appeared to be very thoughtful as she walked homeward. When, however, her mother asked her what she had seen she replied:

"I saw a boy breaking the Sabbath with a big axe!"

Conciliating an Audience.—I remember a story of a certain comedian, by the name of Walsh, at the Theatre Royal, Dublin. The gentleman never rose higher in his profession than to enact those useful but humble individuals in livery who announce the arrival of visitors to the principal personages in the drama. One evening a great tragedian being on the stage, it was Mr. Walsh's duty to come on, attired in plush, and say:

"My lord, the coach is at the door."

This being all that was laid down for him, he said; but, directly afterwards, advancing to the footlights, and addressing the gallery, he continued with much animation:

"And allow me to add that the man who lifts his hand against a woman, save in the way of kindness, is unworthy the name of a Briton."

This sentiment brought down a tornado of applause, but on retiring from the stage the actor was pounced upon by the great tragedian and asked how he had dared to overstep the limits assigned to him.

"I'm very sorry," quoth Mr. Walsh, "but it's my benefit next Monday, and I've got to conciliate the audience as well as you, Mr. Macready."

Rev. Mr. Burnham, of Manchester, recently enlisted in the army as a private, and was sent to the rendezvous at New Haven. Next morning after his arrival, he was summoned before the commanding officer of the post, and addressed: "Mr. Burnham, I see by your name here" (referring to the list), "that you are a reverend. About a dozen reverends have enlisted and come here; and you are the first one who has staid over night without asking for a chaplaincy; I guess we'll make you chaplain!" So they made him chaplain of the post.

The play of "Julius Cæsar" was going on at one of the New York theatres, and the alarm of fire at the Lafarge House took place at that time in the play when Cæsar's wife is entreating him not to go to the Senate that day. One frightened old gentleman exclaimed:

"Why does not somebody come out and tell us what is the matter?"

A voice from the gallery answered:

"Sit down, dad; go on, Mrs. Cæsar."

This speech caused a laugh, and did more than anything else to restore composure.

GREAT FIRE AT SAVANNAH, GA., JAN. 27TH.—SOLDIERS OF THE 19TH CORPS REMOVING AMMUNITION AMONG THE BURNING BUILDINGS UNDER HEAVY FIRE.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, W. T. CRANE.

SKETCHES IN SAVANNAH, GA.

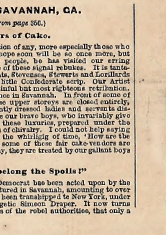
The Bazaars of Cake.

It is painful to witness the humiliation of any, more especially those who were once our sisters, and whom we hope soon will be so once more, but if ever God chastened a rebellious people, he has visited our erring brethren. Our sketch represents one of these signal rebukes. It is tantamount to our Astors, Belmonts, Haights, Stevenses, Stewarts and Lorillards turning cake-venders here to gain a little Confederate scrip. Our Artist says: "I have sent you a sketch of painful but most righteous retribution. It represents a scene of daily occurrence in Savannah. In front of some of the finest residences in the city, whose upper storeys are closed entirely, you will find in the basements elegantly dressed ladies and servants disposing of cakes and other delicacies to our brave boys, who invariably give postal currency and greenbacks for these luxuries, prepared under the superintendence of the fair daughters of chivalry. I could not help saying as I gazed on this curious change in the whirligig of time, 'How are the mighty fallen!' I need not add, that some of these fair cake-venders are very charming women—also, let me say, they are treated by our gallant boys with the most scrupulous respect."

"To the Victors belong the Spoils!"



This celebrated saying of an arch-Democrat has been acted upon by the U. S. Government, for the cotton captured in Savannah, amounting to over 30,000 bales, equal to $30,000,000, has been transferred to New York, under the surveillance of the keen and energetic Simeon Draper. It now turns out, despite the imperative commands of the rebel authorities, that only a small proportion of the cotton belonging to private owners was discovered, and that, after a considerable delay, and a great deal of red-tape, the whole, as a Yankee chronicler says, "got blind in mind of the good old days, are Jeff Davis had become the Lucifer of his country."

As a companion picture we give a sketch of the

laden with good things from New York for the destitute citizens of Savannah—a noble, a spontaneous and a social gift from a forgiving brother to his prodigal junior. Having already dwelt upon this in a previous number, we have only to remark, that the value of the provisions and other supplies sent to our Savannah brothers and sisters in the three steamers amounted to considerably over $100,000. There is every reason to believe that the gift was gratefully received. Such acts light up the stern face of war, and stand in direct contrast to the prison horrors of Andersonville and Millen.

We must not forget to add that the soldiers of the 19th corps greatly distinguished themselves in removing the ammunition during the conflagration of the 17th, and under a heavy fire of bursting shells. The men detailed for this dangerous duty were under the command of Col. York, Provost-Marshal; Capt. Weston and Lieut. Spencer of Gen. Brown's Staff. The shells were taken from a storehouse opposite the main one, filled with ammunition, just across the street, in an old wagon drawn by hand.

FIRE AT SAVANNAH—POWDER KEG PLACED NEAR THE MAGAZINE AT SAVANNAH.

The Citizens of Savannah Supplied by the North.

The picture on page 356 is very significant, although it is merely a companion to that of the arrival of the Rebecca Clyde. It represents the systematic distribution of the supplies contributed by the citizens of New York and Boston, whose advent we have already recorded in another sketch. The correspondent of the N. Y. Times thus describes the scene:

"A store on the corner of Bay and Barnard streets, near the old stone market, has been taken as the depot. Here presided the committee who are witnessing the distribution. Small tents or screens in imagination, and behold the scene: The air is keen, but the sun forms a golden picture, and some of the jolly young fogeys who have been there for days enjoying the mountain pasture-like scenery. There are two orders of people on the sunny side of the buildings. There is a motley crowd on the street. Here, as on the arrival, can exhibit no such spectacle. There are two doors to the store, one on Bay and the other on Barnard street, affording entrance and exit. Several hundred persons of both sexes, all ages, sizes, complexions, costumes—gray-haired old men, with canes, crutches, bottles and baskets; old 'Uncle Neds,' who, just before death gives them liberty from hardship and suffering, are made freemen by the mighty march of events; well-dressed women wearing crape for their husbands and sons, who have fallen while fighting against the old flag; with pale and sunken cheeks, stand there patiently waiting their turn. There are women with tattered dresses—old silks and satins, which years ago were in fashion, which were laid aside as useless, but which have become valuable through destitution. There are women in illy-washery, semi-white women wearing negro cloth, negro women dressed in gummy cloth; men with Confederate uniforms, men with butternut clothes. There is a boy in a crimson plush jacket, made from what was once the upholstering of a sofa.

"There are old men in short jackets, little boys in long coats—the cast-off overcoats of soldiers, the rags which have been picked up from garrets—wearing the boots and shoes which have been kicked off and thrown aside, down at the heel, out at the toes, open on the instep. There are old bonnets of every description; some with white and crimson flowers, some with ribbons once bright and flaming, but faded now and worn. There are Shaker bonnets, 'sangwiscopes,' 'coal-scuttles,' hats of every description, size and shape worn by both sexes—women wearing men's hats of palm-leaf or felt, men wearing battered stove-pipes, full, sleeked and torn, ventilated by accident and not by patent ventilators. There is one which had a crown, worn by a man who has red hair, reminding one of a chimney on fire and flaming out at the top. It is the ragman's fate—then the ragman's jubilee and day of rejoicing, for Charity, like a kind angel, has suddenly stepped in the world of the wolf which is howling at their doors.

"They come with large baskets and bottles, each with a ticket. Thus reads one: 'City of Boston. Mary Morrell, 19 lbs. flour, 7 lbs. bacon, 2 qts. vinegar, 2 lbs. salt.'"

GREAT FIRE AT SAVANNAH, GA., JAN. 27TH.—RESERVOIR BURST BY THE SHELLS.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, W. T. CRANE.

LOUIS NAPOLEON is so opposed to the principles propounded in the Pope's encyclical letter, that he has caused the Archbishop of Bordeaux and the Bishop of Montines to be censured by the Council of State for publishing it in their dioceses.

THE LIVING AND THE DEAD.

How great unto the living seem the dead!
How sacred, solemn; how heroic grown?
How vast and vague, as they obscurely tread
The shadowy confines of the dim unknown—
For they have met the monster that we dread,
Have learned the secret not to mortal shown.
E'en as gigantic shadows on the wall
The spirit of the daunted child amaze,
So on us thoughts of the departed fall,
And with phantasma fill our gloomy gaze.
Awe and deep wonder land the living lines,
And hope and ecstacy the borrowed beams;
While fitful fancy the full form divines,
And all is what imagination dreams.

The Fate of the Forrests.

PART III.

"Stay, Evan, when the others go; I have much to say to you, and a packet of valuable papers to entrust to you. Do not forget."

"You regard me with a strange look, Ursula, you speak in a strange tone. What has happened?"

"They tell me that Felix will live, with care and a journey to the South."

"I catch your meaning now. You will go with him."

"No, my journey will be made alone."

She looked beyond him as she spoke, with a rapt yet tranquil glance, and such a sudden brightness shone upon her face that her cousin watched her half bewildered for a moment; then caught at a hope that filled him with a troubled joy, and whispered with beating heart and lowered voice:

"Shall I not follow you, Ursula?"

Her eye came back to him, clear and calm, yet very tender in its wistfulness, and though her words sounded propitious his hope died suddenly.

"I think you will follow soon, and I shall wait for you in the safe refuge I am seeking."

They stood silent for many minutes, thinking thoughts for which they had no words, then as a pause fell after music, Ursula said:

"Now I must sing again. Give me a draught of water, my throat is parched."

Her cousin served her, but before the water touched her lips the glass fell shattered at her feet, for a wild, shrill cry rang through the house silencing the gay sounds below, and rudely breaking the long hush that had reigned above. For one breathless instant all stood like living images of wonder, fear and fright, all waited for what should follow that dread cry. An agitated servant appeared upon the threshold seeking his mistress. She saw him, yet stood as if incapable of motion, as he made his way to her through a crowd of pale, expectant faces.

"What is it?" she asked, with lips that could hardly syllable the words.

"My master, madam—dead in his bed—old Marjory has just found him. I've sent for Doctor Keen," began the man, but Ursula only seemed to hear and understand one word:

"Dead!" she echoed—"so suddenly, so soon—it cannot be true. Evan, take me to him."

She stretched out her hands as if she had gone blind, and led by her cousin, left the room, followed by several guests, in whom curiosity or sympathy was stronger than etiquette or fear. Up they went, a strange procession, and entering the dusky room, lighted only by a single shaded lamp, found Marjory lamenting over her dead master in a paroxysm of the wildest grief. Evan passed in before his cousin, bent hastily and listened at the breathless lips, touched the chill forehead, and bared the wrist to feel if any flutter lingered in the pulse. But as he pushed back the loose sleeve of the wrapper, upon the wasted arm appeared a strange device. Two slender serpents twined together like the ring, and in the circle several Hindoo characters traced in the same deep red lines. At that sight the arm dropped from his hold, and he fell back daunted by a nameless fear which he could neither master nor divine.

As Ursula appeared the old woman's grief changed to an almost fierce excitement, for rising she pointed from the dead husband to the living wife, crying shrilly:

"Come; come and see your work, fair-faced devil that you are! Here he lies, safe in the deadly sleep you gave him. Look at him and deny it if you dare!"

Ursula did look, and through the horror that blanched her face many eyes saw the shadow of remorse, the semblance of guilt. Stähl lay as she left him, his head pillowed on his arm with the easy grace habitual to him, but the pallor of that sleeping face was now changed to the awful grayness that living countenances never wear. A bitter smile still lingered on the white lips, and those mysterious eyes were wide open, full of a gloomy intelligence that appalled the beholder with the scornful triumph which still lurked there unconquered even by death. These defiant eyes appeared fixed on Ursula alone; she could not look away, nor break the spell that held her own, and through the hurried scene that followed she seemed to address her dead husband, not her living accuser.

"My work? the sleep I gave? what dare I not deny?" she said, below her breath, like one bewildered.

"See her feign innocence with guilt stamped on her face!" cried Marjory, in a passion of indignant sorrow. "You killed him, that is your work. You drugged that cup with the poison I saw you buy to-day—that is the sleep you gave him—and you dare not deny that you hated him, wished him dead, and said last night you'd not be troubled long, for you had borne enough."

"I did not kill him! You saw me prepare his evening draught, and what proof have you that he did not pass away in sleep?" demanded Ursula, more firmly, yet with an awestruck gaze still fixed upon her husband's face.

"This is my proof!" and Marjory held up the empty counterpart of the little vial that lay on the table.

"That here! I left it in my—"

A hand at Ursula's lips cut short the perilous admission, as Evan whispered:

"Hush! for God's sake, own nothing yet."

"Too late for that," screamed Marjory, more and more excited by each word. "I found it in the ashes where she flung it in her haste, believing it was destroyed. I saw it glitter when I went to mend the fire before I woke my master. I knew it by the freshness of the label, and in a moment felt that my poor master was past all waking of mine, and found it so. I saw her buy it, I told him of it, but he loved her still and tried to deceive me with the kind lie that he bade her do it. I showed him that I knew the truth, and he only said, 'I know it, I forgive her, keep the secret for my sake,' and trusting her to the last, paid for his blind faith with his life."

"No, no, I never murdered him! I found him sleeping like a child an hour ago, and in that sleep he died," said Ursula, wringing her hands like one well nigh distraught.

"An hour ago! hear that and mark it all of you," cried Marjory. "Two hours ago she bade him good night before me, and he called her 'Judas,' as she kissed him and went. Now she owns that she returned and found him safely sleeping—God forgive me that I ever left him! for then she must have remixed the draught in which he drank his death. Oh, madam! could you have no pity, could you not remember how he loved you? see your rose fast shut in his poor dead hand—could you not leave him the one little month of life he had to live before you were set free?"

"One month!" said Ursula, with a startled look. "They told me he would live to be a hale, old man. Why was I so deceived?"

"Because he would not mar your pleasure even for a single night. He meant to tell you the sad truth gently, for he thought you had a woman's heart, and would mourn him a little though you could not love."

Paler Ursula could not become, but as mesh after mesh of the net in which she had unconsciously helped to snare herself appeared, her husband's purpose flashed upon her, yet seemed too horrible for belief, till the discovery of that last deceit was made; then like one crushed by an overwhelming blow, she covered up her face and sunk down at Evan's feet. He did not raise her up, and though a gust of eager, agitated voices went whispering through the room, no one spoke to her, no one offered comfort to the widow, counsel to the woman, pity to the culprit. They listened only to old Marjory, who poured forth her story with such genuine grief, such perfect sincerity, that all felt its pathos and few doubted its entire truth. Evan alone believed in Ursula's denial, even while to himself he owned that she had borne enough to make any means of liberation tempting. He saw more clearly than the rest how every act, look and word of hers condemned her; and felt with a bitter pang that such an accusation, even if proved false, must cast a shadow on her name and darken all her life.

Suddenly, when the stir was at its height, Ursula rose, calm, cold and steady; yet few who saw her then ever forgot the desolate despair which made that beautiful face a far more piteous sight than the dead one. Turning with all her wonted dignity, she confronted the excited group, and without a tear in her eye, a falter in her voice, a trace of shame, guilt or fear in mien or manner, she said clearly, solemnly,

"I am guilty of murder in my heart, for I did wish that man dead; but I did not kill him. The words I spoke last night were the expression of a resolve made in a moment of despair, a resolve to end my own life, when I could bear no more. To-day I was told that he would live; then my time seemed come, and believing this to be my last night on earth, I bade my husband farewell as we parted, and in a few hours hoped to lay down the burden he had made heavier than I could bear. That poison was purchased for myself, not him; he discovered it, believed I meant his death, and with a black art, which none can fathom but myself, so distorted my acts and words, before a witness, that the deed committed by himself should doom me to ignominy and avenge his wrong. I have no hope that any one will credit so wild a tale, and therein his safety lies; but God knows I speak the truth, and He will judge between us at a more righteous bar than any I can stand at here. Now do with me as you will, I am done."

Through all the bitter scenes of public accusation, trial and condemnation Ursula preserved the same mournful composure, as if having relinquished both hope and fear, no emotion remained to disturb the spirit of entire self-abnegation which had taken possession of her. All her cousin's entreaties, commands and prayers failed to draw from her the key to the mystery of her strange marriage; even when, after many merciful delays, sentence was at length pronounced upon her, and captivity for life was known to be her doom, she still refused to confess, saying:

"This fate is worse than death; but till I lie on my deathbed I will prove faithful to the promise made that man, traitorous as he was to me. I have done with the world, so leave me to such peace as I can know, and go your way, dear Evan, to forget that such a mournful creature lives."

But when all others fell away, when so-called friends proved timid, when enemies grew insolent and the whole world seemed to cast her off, one man was true to her, one man still loved, believed and honored her, still labored to save her when all others gave her up as lost, still stood between her and the curious, sharp-tongued, heavy-handed world, earning a great compassion for himself, and, in time, a juster, gentler sentiment in favor of the woman whose sin and shame he had so nobly helped to bear.

Weeks and months went heavily by, the city wearied itself with excited conjectures, conflicting rumors, varying opinions, and slowly came to look with more lenient eyes upon the beautiful culprit, whose tragic fate, with its unexplained mystery, began to plead for her more eloquently than the most gifted advocate. Few doubted her guilt, and, as she feared, few believed the accusations she brought against her dead husband; but the plea of temporary insanity had been made by her counsel, and though she strenuously denied its truth, there were daily growing hopes of pardon for an offence which, thanks to Evan's tireless appeals, now wore a far less heinous aspect than at first.

All the long summer days Ursula sat alone in her guarded room, tranquilly enjoying the sunshine that flickered through the leaves with which Evan had tried to mask the bars that shut out liberty but not heaven's light. All the balmy summer nights she lay on her narrow bed, haunted by dreams that made sleep a penance and not a pleasure, or watched, with wakeful eyes, the black shadow of a cross the moon cast upon her breast as it peered through the barred window like a ghostly face. To no one did she reveal the thoughts that burdened her, whitening her hair, furrowing her face and leaving on her forehead the impress of a great grief which no human joy ever could efface.

One autumn day Evan came hastening in full of a glad excitement, which for the moment seemed to give him back the cheery youthfulness he was fast losing. He found his cousin lying on the couch he had provided for her, for even the prison officers respected that faithful love, and granted every favor in their power. She, too, seemed to be blessed with a happy mood, for the gloom had left her eyes, a peaceful smile sat on her lips, and when she spoke her voice was musical, with an undertone of deep emotion.

"Bless your tranquil face, Ursula! One would think you guessed my tidings without telling. Yes, it is almost certain that the pardon will be granted, in answer to my prayers. One more touch will win the men who hold your fate in their hands, and that touch you can give by clearing up the mystery of Stähl's strange power over you. For your own sake and for mine do not deny me now."

"I will not."

The joy, surprise and satisfaction of the moment caused Evan to forget the sad condition upon which this confidence could be accorded. He thought only of all they had suffered, all they might yet enjoy if the pardon could be gained, and holding that thin hand fast in both his own, he listened, with absorbing interest, to the beloved voice that unfolded to him the romance within a romance, which had made a tragedy of three lives.

"I must take you far back into the past, Evan, for my secret is but the sequel of one begun long before our birth. Our grandfather, as you know, was made governor of an Indian province while still a young and comely man. One of the native princes, though a conquered subject, remained his friend, and the sole daughter of this prince loved the handsome Englishman with the despotic fervor of her race. The prince offered the hand of the fair Naya to his friend, but being already betrothed to an English girl, he courteously declined the alliance. That insult, as she thought it, never was forgiven or forgotten by the haughty princess; but, with the subtle craft of her half-savage nature, she devised a vengeance which should not only fall upon the offender, but pursue his descendants to the very last. No apparent breach was made in the friendship of the prince and governor, even when the latter brought his young wife to the residence. But from that hour Naya's curse was on his house, unsuspected and unsleeping, and as years went by the Fate of the Forrests became a tragical story throughout British India, for the brothers, nephews and sons of Roger Forrest all died violent or sudden deaths, and the old man himself was found murdered in the jungle when at the height of fame and favor.

"Two twin lads alone remained of all who had borne the name, and for a time the fatal doom seemed averted, as they grew to manhood, married and seemed born to know all the blessings which virtue and valor could deserve. But though the princess and her father were dead, the curse was still relentlessly executed by some of her kindred, for in the year of your birth your father vanished suddenly, utterly, in broad day, yet left no trace behind, and from that hour to this no clue to the lost man was ever found beyond a strong suspicion, which was never confirmed. In that same year a horrible discovery was made, which shocked and dismayed all Christian India, and was found hard of belief across the sea. Among the tribes that infested certain provinces, intent on mischief and difficult to subdue, was one class of assassins unknown even to the native governments of the country, and entirely unsuspected by the English. This society was as widely spread and carefully organised as it was secret, powerful and fanatical. Its members worshipped a gloomy divinity called Bohwanie, who, according to their heathen belief, was best propitiated by human sacrifices. The name of these devotees was Phansagare, or Brothers of the Good Work; and he who offered up the greatest number of victims was most favored by the goddess, and received a high place in the Hindoo heaven. All India was filled with amazement and affright at this discovery, and mysteries, till then deemed unfathomable, became as clear as day. Among others the Fate of the Forrests was revealed; for by the confession of the one traitor who betrayed the society, it appeared that the old prince and his sons had been members of the brotherhood, which had its higher and its lower grades, and when the young governor drew down upon himself the wrath of Naya, her kindred avenged her by propitiating Bohwanie with victim after victim from our fated family, always working so secretly that no trace of their art remained but the seal of death.

"This terrible discovery so dismayed my father that, taking you, an orphan then, and my mother, he fled to England, hoping to banish the dreadful past from his mind. But he never could, and it preyed upon him night and day. No male Forrest had escaped the doom since the curse was spoken, and an unconquerable foreboding haunted him that sooner or later he too should be sacrificed, though continents and oceans lay between him and the avengers. The fact that the black brotherhood was discovered and destroyed weighed little with him, for still a fear pursued him that Naya's kindred would hand down the curse from generation to generation, and execute it with that tenacity of purpose which in that climate of the passions makes the humblest foe worthy of fear. He doubted all men, confided his secret to none, not even to his wife, and led a wandering life with us until my mother died. You remember, Evan, that the same malady that destroyed her fell likewise upon you, and that my father was forced to leave us in Paris, that he might comply with my mother's last desire and lay her in English ground. Before he went he took me apart and told me the dark history of our unfortunate family, that I might be duly impressed with the necessity of guarding you with a sleepless vigilance; for even then he could not free himself from that ominous foreboding, soon, alas! to be confirmed. It was a strange confidence to place in a girl of seventeen, but he had no friend at hand, and knowing how wholly I loved you, how safe I was from the Fate of the Forrests, he gave you to my charge and left us for a week. You know he never came again, but found his ghostly fear a sad reality in England, and on the day that was to give my mother's body to the earth he was discovered dead in his bed, with the marks of fingers at his throat, yet no other trace of his murderer ever appeared, and another dark secret was buried in the grave. You remember the horror and the grief that nearly killed me when the tidings came, and how from that hour there was a little cloud between us, a cloud I could not lift because I had solemnly promised my father that I would watch over you, yet conceal the fate that menaced you, lest it should mar your peace as it had done his own. Evan, I have kept my word till the danger is for ever past."

She paused there, but for a moment her cousin could only gaze at her, bewildered by the sudden light let in by the gloomy past. Presently he said, impetuously:

"You have, my faithful Ursula, and I will prove that I am grateful by watching over you with a vigilance as sleepless and devoted as your own. But tell me, was there nowhere in the world justice, power or wit enough to stay that savage curse? Why did not my father, or yours, appeal to the laws of either country and obtain redress?"

"They did, and, like others, appealed in vain; for, till the Phansegars were discovered, they knew not whom to accuse. After that, as Naya's kindred were all gone but a few newly-converted women and harmless children, no magistrate in India would condemn the innocent for the crimes of their race, and my father had no proofs to bring against them. Few in England believed the seemingly incredible story when it was related to them in the Indian reports. No, Evan, the wily princess entrusted her revenge to able hands, and well they did the work to the very last, as we have bitter cause to know. Every member of the brotherhood, and every helper of the curse, bore on his left arm the word 'Bohwanie!' in Hindoo characters. You saw the sign on that dead arm. Do you understand the secret now?"

"Great heavens, Ursula! Do you mean that Stähl, a Christian man, belonged to this heathen league? Surely you wrong him there."

"You will not think so when I have told all. It seemed as horrible, as incredible to me as now to you, when I first saw and comprehended on the night that changed both our lives. Stähl suspected, from many unconscious betrayals of mine (my dislike of India, my anxiety for you, then absent, and a hundred indications unseen by other eyes) that I knew the secret of the curse; he proved it by whispering the hated name of Bohwanie in my ear, and showing me the fatal sign—I knew it, for my father had told me that also. Need I tell you what recollections rushed upon me when I saw it, what visions of blood rose red before my panic-stricken eyes, how instantly I felt the truth of my instinctive aversion to him, despite his charms of mind and manner, and, above all, how utterly I was overpowered by a sense of your peril in the presence of your unknown enemy? A single thought, hope, purpose ruled me, to save you at any cost, and guard the secret still; for I felt that I possessed some power over that dread man, and resolved to use it to the uttermost. You left us, and then I learned at what a costly price I could purchase the life so dear to me. Stähl briefly told me that his mother and one old woman were the last of Naya's race, and when his grandfather, who belonged to the brotherhood, suffered death with them, he charged her to perpetuate the curse, as all the members of the family had pledged themselves to do. She promised, and when my father left India she followed, but could not discover his hiding-place, and with a blind faith in destiny, as native to her as her superstition, she left time to bring her victim to her. While resting from her quest in Germany she met and married Felix Stähl, the elder, a learned man, fond of the mysticism and wisdom of the East, who found an irresistible charm in the dark-eyed woman, who, for his sake, became a Christian in name, though she still clung to her Pagan gods in secret. With such parents what wonder that the son was the man we found him? for his father bequeathed him his features, feeble health, rare learning and accomplishments; his mother those Indian eyes that I never can forget, his fiery yet subtle nature, the superstitious temperament and the fatal vow.

"While the father lived she kept her secret hidden; when he died, Felix, then a man, was told it, and having been carefully prepared by every art, every appeal to the pride and passion of his race, every shadow years of hatred could bring to blacken the memory of the first Forrest and the wrong he was believed to have done their ancestors, Felix was induced to take upon himself the fulfilment of the family vow. Yet living in a Christian community, and having been bred up by a virtuous father, it was a hard task to assume, and only the commands of the mother whom he adored would have won compliance. He was told that but two Forrests now remained, one a girl who was to go scatheless, the other a boy, who, sooner or later, was to fall by his hand, for he was now the last male of his race as you of ours. How his mother discovered these facts he never knew, unless from the old woman who came to them from England to die near her kin. I suspect that she was the cause of my poor father's death, though Stähl swore that he never knew of it until I told him.

"After much urging, many commands, he gave the promise, asking only freedom to do the work as he would, for though the savage spirit of his Hindoo ancestors lived again in him, the influence of civilization made the savage modes of vengeance abhorrent to him. His mother soon followed the good professor, then leaving our meeting still to chance, Felix went roaming up and down the world a solitary, studious man, for ever haunted by the sinful deed he had promised to perform, and which grew ever more and more repugnant to him.

"In an evil hour we met; my name first arrested him; my beauty (I may speak of it now for it is gone) attracted him; my evident aversion piqued his pride and roused his will to overcome it; and then the knowledge of my love for you fanned his smouldering passion to a blaze and confirmed his wavering purpose. You asked on that sad night if I had learned to love while you were gone? I spoke truly when I answered yes, for absence proved how dear you had become to me, and I only waited your return to gratefully accept the love with which I knew your heart was overflowing. You came, and seeing Stähl's devotion, doubted the affection I never had confessed. He saw it plainly, he divined your passion, and in an hour decided upon gratifying his own desire, keeping the promise he made his mother, yet sparing himself the crime of murder, well knowing that for you life without me would be a fate more dark than any death he could devise. I pleaded, prayed and wept, but he was inexorable. To tell you was to destroy you, for he feared nothing; to keep the secret was to forfeit your love and sacrifice myself. One hope alone remained to me, a sinful yet a pardonable one in such a strait as mine; Felix could not live long; I might support life for a time by the thought that I had saved you, by the hope that I might soon undeceive and recompense you for the loss you had sustained. Evan, it was a natural yet unrighteous act, for I did evil that good might come of it, and such deeds never prosper. Better have left you in God's hand, better even have seen you dead and at peace than have condemned you to the life you have led and still must lead for years perhaps. I was a weak, loving, terror-stricken woman, and in that dreadful hour one fear overwhelmed all other passions, principles and thoughts. I could save you, and to accomplish that I would so gladly have suffered death in any shape. Believe that, dearest Evan, and forgive me for the fate to which I have condemned the man I love, truly, tenderly even to the end."

Her voice died in a broken sob as Evan gathered her close to his sore heart, and she clung there spent and speechless, as if the pain of parting were for ever over and her refuge found at last. Evan spoke first, happily and hopefully for, the future opened clearly, and the long twilight seemed about to break into a blissful dawn.

"You shall be repaid for your exceeding love, Ursula, with a devotion such as man never gave to woman until now. There is no longer any cloud between us, nor shall there be between you and the world. Justice shall be done, and then we will leave this city of bitter memories behind us, and go away together to begin the new life that lies before us."

"We shall begin a new life, but not together, Evan," was the low answer, as she tenderly laid her pale cheek to his, as if to soften the hard truth.

"But, love, you will be free at once; there can be no doubt of the pardon now."

"Yes, I shall soon be free, but human hands will not open my prison doors, and I humbly trust that I may receive pardon, but not from human lips. Evan, I told you I would never tell my secret till I lay on my deathbed; I lie there now."

If she had stabbed him with the hand folded about his neck, the act would not have shocked and startled him like those last words. They pierced him to the heart, and as if in truth he had received a mortal wound, he could only gaze at her in dumb dismay, with eyes full of anguish, incredulity and grief.

"Let me seem cruel that I may be merciful, and end both suspense and fear by telling all at once. There is no hope for me. I have prayed to live, but it cannot be, for slowly yet surely Felix has killed me. I said I would gladly die for you, God takes me at my word, and now I am content. Let me make my sacrifice cheerfully, and let the suffering I have known be my atonement for the wrong I did myself and you."

As she spoke so tranquilly, so tenderly, a veil seemed to fall from before her cousin's eyes. He looked into the face that smiled at him, saw there the shadow which no human love can banish, read perfect peace in its pale serenity, felt that life was a poor boon to ask for her, and with a pang that rent that faithful heart of his, silently relinquished the one sustaining hope which had upheld him through that gloomy year. Calm with a grief too deep for tears, he drew the wan and wasted creature who had given herself for him closer to the shelter of his arms, and changed her last fear to loving pride by saying, with a manful courage, a meek resignation that ennobled him by its sincerity:

"Rest here in peace, my Ursula. No selfish grief shall cloud your sunset or rob you of one hour of happy love. I can bear the parting, for I shall follow soon; and thank God that after the long bewilderment of this sad world we may enjoy together the new life which has no end."

THE END.

INSTINCTS.

Heaven gave the bee desire for sweets,
And spreads the meads with flowers,
The thirsty earth for moisture waits,
And, lo! the gentle showers.

Nor are the instincts of the heart
Less God's peculiar care,
Nor would He sympathies impart
Merely to perish there.

The heart that craves a kindred mind
To share its woe or pain,
Be sure of this, will always find
A heart to love again.

ONLY A CLOD.

CHAPTER XII.—A MODERN GENTLEMAN'S DIARY.

Francis Tredethlyn went back to the hotel in Covent Garden, with the little sheepskin-covered volume appertaining to the gentleman who called himself Robert Lesley safely bestowed in his pocket. He went straight back to the hotel, ate his simple dinner, drew the candles near him, and then, taking up a poker from the hearth, made short work of the lock under which the stranger had kept his secrets. All thought of those sunny gardens and drawing-rooms at Twickenham, the glancing river, the woody background, faded out of his mind for a time, and gave place to one settled purpose—the discovery of his missing cousin's destroyer.

Yes, her destroyer! He had only been able to read Mrs. Burfield's story in one fashion. The solitary departure in the chill light of a winter's morning, the haste and secrecy, the lonely return long afterwards—these things seemed to the young man to point only to one conclusion. The simple Cornish girl's faith had been betrayed by the man she had so implicitly trusted.

In the little volume before him Francis Tredethlyn hoped to find some further clue to that sad history. He seemed to take a savage pleasure in punishing the neat brazen lock, which he shattered with a couple of vigorous blows from the handle of the poker.

"I wonder whether, when a man's a villain, he writes that down?" thought Mr. Tredethlyn. "I can't fancy a scoundrel putting the truth about himself even on paper; and if the truth isn't here, I can't see how the book will help me. And yet there must be secrets in it too, or he'd never have had such a lock as this. Mr. Lowther used to throw his journal about anywhere, and I don't think he ever did anything that was particularly worth writing down."

The Cornishman began to turn over the volume very slowly, looking at the pages cautiously, almost as if he expected to see some venomous creature crawl out from between the leaves. The first twenty pages of the book were filled with the records of a college life, in which brief memoranda of study were interspersed with boating slang and turf calculations. The name of a certain Rosa, of the King's Head, appeared very often in these earlier pages; and there were little epigrams about Rosa, bespeaking the easy-going morality of a Rochester or a Sedley, rather than the pure sentiments of a Tennyson or a Longfellow. Altogether there was a reckless, swaggering manner about the book, which very well corresponded with Mrs. Burfield's description of the prancing stranger.

But the volume had no interest for Francis Tredethlyn until he came to the twentieth page, where the name of Coltonslough figured for the first time:

"November 8.—The abomination of desolation, and just the place for a fellow that wants to read hard and be delivered from the society of his fellow-creatures! Arrived yesterday afternoon; found civil landlady, stereotyped seaside accommodation; decrepit easy-chair, slippery horsehair cushions; no window curtains to speak of, and a great deal of unnecessary drapery festooned about a rickety tent bedstead; wash-handstand one size too large for a doll, and fifty sizes too small for any civilised being; shells and shepherdesses on the mantelpieces, and any amount of blown glass decanters on the sideboard. Dined on chops, which were fried, soddened in their own grease. Must speak to the landlady to-morrow, and insist on gridiron. The woman who would fry chops would think nothing of human sacrifices. A girl waited on me, a good deal younger than Rosa, and I think prettier—but we have changed all that, so I didn't take particular notice of her. Read hard till after one, and write this before retiring to my couch—flock, and lumpy—for I dug my knuckles into the counterpane while examining the apartment.

"November 9.—The girl, who is infinitely superior to Rosa, brought me my breakfast. More chops, not fried, but soddened in relic of the dark ages entitled Dutch oven, for I inquired; and underdone French rolls. Why, O provincial baker, always underdone? What grudge dost thou bear against thy fellow-man that thou seekest insidiously to undermine his constitution with thy clammy breadstuffs? Girl, infinitely prettier than Rosa, cleared away breakfast. Very shy, and only answers polite inquiries in monosyllables. Asked if she was relation of woman of house. No, no relation, nursery governess to children. Comes from some remote district in the west of England; evidently objects to be precise as to locality. Heard her go down kitchen stairs with teathings, and did not hear her reascend them. Conclude that the nursery is somewhere in the cellarage. Read hard all day. Smoke and stroll in the evening. Landlady waited on me at dinner. Dismal change, after monosyllabic girl, recalling Death's head at Egyptian banquets, but not crowned with flowers. More reading after dinner, brandy-and-water—cold, and now to bed. Have ordered mattress to be put over flock. Sleeping on knobby surface all very well now and then, but not for a permanence. Mem.:—To keep my eye upon Lord Paisley's 'Blazing Tom,' for the Craven meeting.

"November 12.—No diary yesterday or the day before. Read with German crib—wonderful fellows those Germans for first-class translations of classic fogies. Wrote to H. C. to put a pony on 'Blazing Tom.' Walked on the esplanade in the afternoon, and made the acquaintance of monosyllabic Cornish girl, infinitely prettier than Rosa. Yes, I succeeded in breaking the ice, with considerable trouble, for I never did see anything feminine so shy and frightened as this brown-eyed Cornish girl. 'Her eye's dark charm,' &c. Well, there is something of the gazelle in her eyes, something shrinking and fawnlike. I could fancy the white doe of what's-its-name looking as she looked at me yesterday.

"I went out for my smoke and stroll rather earlier than I had intended. I saw the Cornish girl and three uncouth children in rusty leather boots, wending their way across the piece of waste ground which forms the delicious prospect before my window. A nice, cool, gray afternoon, with a low yellow streak on the western horizon; a gray sea, melting into a gray sky, with only just that one golden streak glimmering along the edge of the waters; the sort of afternoon that reminds one of the Tennyson's poetry. So I lighted my cigar and went out for a stroll. Perhaps I followed the monosyllabic girl. What do I know? as that amiable French nuisance, who is perpetually quoted in newspaper leaders, remarked. Enough that I went, found the Cornish girl, very shabbily dressed, but unutterably pretty, strolling listlessly up and down the paved walk beside the sea. They call it the sea, but oh for the roaring breakers of the Atlantic, or the long hoarse roar of the waves, as the German Ocean surges on broad yellow sands yonder, far away in the north!

"And so, having lighted my cigar, I strolled up and down the esplanade. Of course I began to talk to the children. If children have any use in this world, which I have been frequently inclined to doubt, surely it must be in this matter of serving as a means of introduction to pretty nursemaids. The children and I were intimate in no time; the presuming little imps became, of course, obnoxiously familiar; and, like all go-betweens, were very difficult to shake off when done with. But I got the Cornish girl to talk at last. She is not stupid, only shy; and she told me a good deal, in a pretty, simple, girlish way, about her native county, always keeping clear of all precise allusion to locality, by-the-bye. She is very pretty—I had almost written lovely, but that adjective can only be applied to a highbred beauty. She is extremely pretty, and that white doe of Rhylston (isn't it?) look in her eyes haunted me all last night while I was reading. Yes, it was very pleasant, that stroll upon the esplanade. I threw away my first cigar, and forgot to light another, though she would have allowed me to smoke, I dare say. It was very pleasant, that cool gray sea, and the yellow streak fading in the west, and the flat gray shore, and the generally Tennysonian aspect of everything. It was very much better than the King's Arms, and a lot of fellows drinking no end of Bass, and chaffing Rosa. I don't suppose this Cornish girl knows what chaff means. I almost shudder when I think of Rosa, with her big, round black eyes, and the sticky little curls upon her forehead, and the tartan neck ribbons, and great yellow ear-rings. And Oxonians have married Rosas before my time, and have deservedly gone to the dogs thereupon. But fifty thousand is your figure, my dear Robert, fifty thousand, well sounded, and no separate use and maintenance humbug either. Something in the commercial widow line, I suppose you will have to put up with, my poor Bob, but no greedy old parent to interfere with the disposal of the money. The widow, or the orphan, if a fifty thousand pounder, is the sort of article for you, dear child.

"November 13.—She brought me my breakfast this morning—(what, is she she already? Alas, poor Rosa!)—and I got her to pour out my tea. I couldn't detain her long: she was so very busy, she said, and seemed painfully anxious to get away. I made her talk a little. She has a nice low voice—'an excellent thing,' &c.! Now Rosa had a vixenish way of speaking that always jarred upon me, even when I was deepest down that pit into which the fair barmaid's admirers cast themselves. She—the Cornish girl—is what people call a genteel young person, with white hands and a slim waist, and a nice way of doing her hair and putting on her collars and cuffs. Her name is Susan Turner, by-the-bye, and the children call her Susie. Could anything sound more pastoral? Susie. The name of Rosa was always so painfully suggestive of nigger melodies. Another cool gray afternoon, and another low yellow line across the sky, so I went out for my smoke at the same time as yesterday. She was on the esplanade with the children. She instructs them in arithmetic, writing, and elementary smatterings of history, geography, and grammar, after dinner, and then brings them out for a walk till tea-time, after which they 'retire to rest,' as the novelists have it, not without considerable rebellious scuffing in the passage and on the stairs. That is the order of the day. In the morning, I suspect she is a housemaid, parlormaid, needlewoman, or anything else that my landlady's necessities oblige her to be. But she is always equally neat and pretty, and if she were only provided with that trifling little matter of fifty thousand or so in the elegant simplicity of the three per cents., I should be decidedly inclined to fall in love with her. Does one ever fall in love with the fifty thousand pounder, by-the-bye? I rather think not. She, Susie, was was not quite so shy this afternoon, and we talked a good deal. I offered to lend her some books. offered to lend Rosa books once, when I was in the lowest depths of spooneyism, and was unhappy about her grammar—those dreadful, superflous 'whiches,' and intolerable 'as hows!'—but Rosa rejected my literature as dry rubbish that gave her the horrors. I had lent her the 'Bride of Lammermoor.' My little Susie won't turn up that innocent nose of hers at any sentimental story, I'll be bound. I've found an odd volume of Byron, containing 'Parisina' and the 'Prisoner of Chillon,' and a lot of the 'To Thyrza,' business.

"N.B.—I find that I've called her my little Susie! Pretty well, as I've been only a week in the place. Am I going down into another pit, I wonder—a deeper abyss than that into which Rosa casts her victims? Poor, pretty, fawn-eyed little darling! Take care of yourself, my dear Robert. Poor, friendless Susie! She couldn't well be worse off under any circumstances than she is in this place, that's one blessing; the drudge of a mistress who is herself a slave in the bondage of poverty. I went down to the kitchen yesterday to get a fresh supply of coals—these people are ready to fall down and worship me because I'm not proud, as they put it, but there are numerous orders of pride, I think—and I saw their dinner. Such a poor bone of mutton. Poor little Susie! how she would open her eyes at sight of the Richmond and Greenwich banquets that I have seen given to persons as inferior to herself as—Hyperion to the other person; what a frightful hindrance to original composition is that abominable habit of hackneyed quotation! the great newspaper mill going round three hundred and thirteen times a year, and only one little limited stock of quotations for all the leader writers.

"November 16.—Sunday, and a wet day; saw Susan start for church in the morning with prayer-books and children. Strolled out with umbrella a little after twelve; found church; unpleasant new building, smelling of damp stucco, and looking like an edifice of soddened brown paper; waited in the porch, patient as that young idiot in Arthur Pendennis's poem, until my lady came out, and conducted her home in triumph under my umbrella, while the awkward squad of children brought up the rear, under cover of the maternal gingham. She was obliged to take my arm, and as the walk from church is rather a long one, we got alarmingly intimate—when I say alarmingly intimate, I mean that she has taking to blushing when I speak to her. That's the worst of these fawnlike girls, they will blush! And when they are pretty the blushes are so bewitching. And when they don't happen to have fifty thousand or so what is a fellow to do? Take to his heels, replies the stern moralist, who has sown his own wild oats twenty years ago, and is envious of the young scatterers of to-day. I came to Coltonslough to read, and come what may I shall stay there till it's time to go back to St. B. In the meantime, Susie is a brown-eyed angel, an angel who leads the life of a lowbred drudge, and for whom any possible change of circumstances must be a change for the better.

"Of course I questioned her about the sermon as we walked home. Take an interest in sermons, and women will believe in you though you were the veriest scoundrel that ever admired Voltaire and considered the 'Pucelle' his chef d'œuvre. What a little Puritan she is! She has been to church twice every Sunday ever since she can remember, she told me, and to Sunday school, and to all kinds of examinations and cross-examinations in the vicar's parlor. I don't suppose she would have floundered as I did, and come to grief over some of the questions those old fogies at Oxford asked me about Biblical history. She knows all about Saul, and David, and Jonathan, and those everlasting wars with the Philistines, I dare say. She is very pretty, lovely—yes, lovely, although not highbred. I sometimes fancy, though, that she must have decent blood in her veins. I never saw a prettier little hand upon my arm than that which rested there to-day, as I brought her home from church. If I were—something utterly different from what I am, I would get my degree, go in for a country curacy, and little Susie should be my wife. But noblesse oblige; which very elastic aphorism means, in my case, that I must marry a rich woman, and hold my own in my native county whenever the reigning potentate is polite enough to retire to the dusky shades whither all earthly sovereigns must go.

"Poor little Susan! pretty little Susan! When I am a county magnate, laying down the law at the head of my table in the great dining-room at the hall, shall I look back and think of these days, and smile at myself, remembering that I could be so foolish as to go out on a wet Sunday to escort a little nursemaid along a damp clay road?

"Read hard all the afternoon; dined on an elderly fowl flavored with Dutch oven, a bird that must have known Coltonslough when the first bow-windowed house was a damp brickwork skeleton, grim and open to the howling of the winds. Read for some time after dinner, and let my fire out. Went downstairs to hunt up matches and firewood, and found my landlady and Susan sitting opposite to each other at a little table, with one tallow candle, reading pious compositions of an evangelical tendency. They both seemed glad to see me, so I stopped and talked to them. Susan had read the 'Prisoner of Chillon;' she read it last night, and cried over it 'fearful,' my landlady informed me; so we were able to talk about the poem, and I read two or three of the fugitive pieces aloud. I used to be rather great at the debating club at O——, and I gave them the 'Thyrzas' and 'Day of My Destiny' very strong. I could see the tears shining in Susan's eyes before I'd finished. I used to recite poetry to Rosa sometimes, when I'd been taking too much Bass, and we stood in the moonlit porch at the King's Arms, with the river, and the willows, and the towing-path all of a shimmer in the silvery light; but one is apt to get tired of reciting sentimental poetry to a young person who cries, 'Lor, how funny!' at the close of some passionate verse. I remember thundering out that grand anathema of Tom Moore's against the Prince Regent, 'Go, deceiver, go!' and my Rosa asked me, naïvely, what the gentleman had done that the other gentleman should use such bad language to him. No, Rosa, your strong point was not intellect. In the matter of sticky curls and large black eyes you are unsurpassed, but the sentimental element in your nature may be represented by zero."

THE WIVES, DAUGHTERS AND SERVANTS OF THE CHIVALRY OF SAVANNAH ACCEPTING AID FROM THE U. S. COMMISSARY—SIDEBET SCENE.—Sketched by our Special Artist, W. T. Crane.

HON. D. S. DICKINSON.

THIS able and honest lawyer, politician and statesman, of whom a capital portrait accompanies this article, was born in Goshen, Conn., A.D. 1800. His father was a farmer of the sturdy, sensible Yankee breed, and Mr. Dickinson legitimately inherits from his New England ancestry his practical sense, his uncompromising uprightness and unyielding devotion to principle, and his love of character.

Mr. Dickinson's education was nothing but a scanty allowance of district school-training. He had, however, the iron resolution, strong conviction of the worth of knowledge, and fortunate power of will, which have lifted other self-made men. His father had moved out to Western New York when he was we only six years old, and the youth, in spite of all the disadvantages of his remote location, pursued his own plans of education, and mastered the Latin language, and taught it himself, whenever he was studying, became very successful in the justice business of his section of the country, rapidly rose to professional standing, and became known and respected as a practitioner in the higher courts of the State. He entered upon the higher grades of political life by becoming State Senator in 1836. From that time to the present Mr. Dickinson's career has been an elevated, influential and honorable one before the eyes of the whole people of the United States. His own great State has repeatedly testified its value for his services, by choosing him, at different times, Lieut.-Gov., Presidential Elector at Large, Attorney-General, and United States Senator for the term from 1844 to 1851, and he has also held various minor but responsible and honorable offices of public trust.

Mr. Dickinson is an able lawyer and a shrewd and strong politician. He is more than that, he is a true patriot and a real statesman. He is still more—he is an upright and spotlessly moral Christian man and citizen. In truth, he is, perhaps, as well-known for refusing to sacrifice principle to party or political success as for any other quality. Though always a thorough and enthusiastic Democratic principle and by instinct, when in his honest judgment his party drifted from its just support of its policy, he adhered to that line and calmly suffered his party to leave him, remaining at last a steadfast supporter of the Union, and of all the measures and persons whose success he believed identified with the perfectness of the rebellion. We scarcely need to add many of our readers know, that he is a powerful and successful stump lawyer, and a ready, able, and influential political speaker.

Up to the year 1864 Mr. Dickinson had invariably refused to be personally interested with the affairs of any financial or corporate concern. At that time, however, one of the petroleum companies, of which so many hundreds have been set in operation within a few years, succeeded in convincing him that its enterprise was legitimate, sound and safe, and that he would scarcely risk his own interests, without endangering his good name, by becoming identified with it.

This was the Tarr Farm and Liverpool Petroleum Company, of which Mr. Dickinson is President. This company commenced its active operations about the beginning of November, 1864. One chief principle upon which its managers proceeded has been to carefully avoid secret sales. Every one of our individual readers might have lands or other oil property to sell, at the expense of one dollar advertising. On the other hand, they have uniformly considered the best interests of the stockholders as the only rule for conducting the concerns of the company, and have acted in good faith upon this rule.

The inducements offered in the original prospectuses and advertisements of the company, and the high and unexpected character of the gentlemen immediately identified and in the Board of Trustees, rapidly supplied it with the funds necessary for a working capital; and with $100,000 in its treasury, operations were soon set out in the beginning of the present year, who passed a considerable time in the oil regions, in selecting from the numerous oil lands and leases offered to the company such as would afford the soundest and safest sites for its mining works. This was successfully accomplished, and the company now owns interests in lands and other properties, conveyed to it in fee, by undisputed and certain titles, and paid for, for a total which constitutes an admirable real estate basis for its actual operations to mining and selling petroleum.

A corporation like the New York and Liverpool Petroleum Company needs, in order to attract and justify the confidence of the public, managers of proper character, sufficient capital, a practical working organization, sound business rules, and, lastly, the actual success which those preliminaries are sure to bring. In all these particulars, it is believed that the company stands in a remarkably high position. A few words will suffice, out of place on some of these heads:

MANAGERS.—Of Mr. Dickinson we have spoken. The remaining executive officers of the company are gentlemen of experience and good repute in the business world.

The Board of Trustees includes, not merely these gentlemen and others of good character and standing, but several whose circumstances constitute a special and peculiar guarantee for careful and judicious management. Such, for instance, are—

J. H. Angier, Esq., who is a member of the very rich and strong firm of Brewer, Watson & Co.

L. W. Myers, Esq., one of the most prominent oil shippers of the petroleum mart of Titusville, and a gentleman of recognized ability and means.

Dr. W. M. Jennings, of Zanesville, whose shrewdness and success as a business man have already secured him a considerable fortune.

W. F. Newton, Esq., a well-known and cautious oil operator, and others. The gentleman just specified lives in the oil region, where the interests of the company are situated, and in the immediate neighborhood. Their own means have been to a great extent acquired in the oil business. They understand the general principles of business, and the special characteristics of the oil business in particular. And they own stock in this company, which stock they hold for the sake of the dividends which they believe it will hereafter yield. These circumstances together give as much certainty as human affairs permit, that the transactions of the company will be carefully watched, conducted in the best manner, and with that kind of economy which only an owner's eye can enforce.

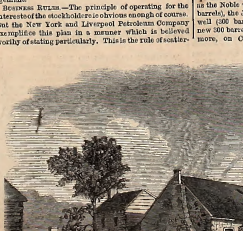
CAPITAL.—The capital of the company already actually paid in is ample to carry its mining concerns into full operation, having, as has been stated, reached $100,000 within the first two months of its existence, and being steadily on the increase by sales of stock now constantly made at the par value of $10 per share.

WORKING ORGANIZATION.—For the practical nature of the working organization of the company, the character of those who have thus far formed and conducted it, must, for the present, be its guarantee. But it may be mentioned that the Company's Mining Superintendent, Mr. R. J. Dutis, is a practical mining engineer of large experience, decided skill, and high local reputation. Indeed his employment as mining superintendent was instantly recognized in the oil regions to the vicinity of the Company's lands, as a material enhancement of the value of the stock, and a proof of the sagacity of its management.

BUSINESS RULES.—The principle of operating for the interests of the stockholders is obvious enough of course. But the New York and Liverpool Petroleum Company exemplifies this plain in a manner which is believed worthy of stating particularly. This is the rule of selling stock. It is a fixed principle of the company to seek to place its shares rather in the hands of many small than of a few large ones. It thus avoids the danger of falling helplessly within the control of any one or two rich men, who might then proceed to make the company a mere speculating machine for their private gain, and might sell it out bodily, or ruin it, when or as they might choose. The managers of the company have, in fact, once or twice already actually declined large offers made to them for buying their stock in great quantities, from an apprehension of the probability of such consequences. It has also adopted another beneficial rule, namely, not to hold any property or interest whatever, which is not under its own exclusive control and management. This avoids depending (for instance) for the oil from a well on the good faith and skill of other parties operating it.

The present possessions of the company are as follows: A half interest in the Borough well, at Titusville, now producing from six to ten barrels of oil a day, and increasing. This oil is obtained close to the railroad, and is worth more accordingly; the working interest in the Kelly lease, near the Borough well, on which lease a well is now going down; the working interest in the Morrison and Alvin wells, which are close together, near the celebrated Noble well and Sherman well, and both of which have already yielded largely; the Parker farm lease, in Oil Creek, with a well just being pumped, room for ten or fifteen more, and close to the Continental well (75 barrels), and the Hoyt, Bartis, Fitch, Stewart and Palmer wells, all steadily yielding; the Hart farm of 93 acres, on Cherry Run, in the same neighborhood as the Noble well; the Egbert farm, the Coquet well (600 barrels), the Jersey well (400 barrels), the Maple Shade well (300 barrels), and the United States Company's new 300 barrel well; the Whitney farm, of 200 acres or more, on Oil Creek, first-class oil land; and the Mowbray Refinery, now to be known as the New York and Liverpool Refinery.

Thus this company has all already coming in, several wells in actual operation, room for sinking several hundred wells if desirable, and means for refining and marketing its own produce in an economical manner.



Subject to the natural chances of human affairs, the prospects of this company are very sure and very brilliant, and we sincerely hope, as we fully expect, that Mr. Dickinson, as well as his officers and stockholders, will find their participation in this undertaking largely and permanently profitable.

We know that a quarterly dividend is already talked of and fully expected, though the managers have preferred to wait until they were beyond all uncertainties before publicly committing themselves on this point. Stock subscribed for within a few weeks will of course be entitled to this dividend. It is also another and a very satisfactory proof of the real success of this company, that it has discontinued the sale of stock at the subscription price of $5 per share. This price was fixed at first, and was retained until an ample working capital was secured. As soon as this was done, however, the full value of the stock was very properly demanded, and it is now readily selling at par, or $10 a share. While on this point, we may suggest that subscriptions for stock to any amount may be sent, addressed to the company, Post Office Box 2358, New York city, either in greenbacks, drafts or Government bonds and securities at market prices; or they may be sent for the company, addressed thus: "Atlantic Bank, Treasury New York and Liverpool Petroleum Company, 142 Broadway, New York City."

Mr. Dickinson is now precisely at the time of life when his wisdom and practical experience render him capable of the maximum of service to the public, and we accordingly expect, to consolidation, our stormy hope that his future public career may be as in the past, bright, lofty and always upward to higher honors.

HON. DANIEL S. DICKINSON.—FROM A RECENT PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.

A REVOLUTIONARY RELIC—HOUSE OF GEN. CHARLES LEE, IN THE SHENANDOAH VALLEY.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

HOUSE OF GEN. C. LEE.

OUR ARTIST who accompanied Gen. Sheridan's forces to the Shenandoah valley sent us a sketch of this curious old house, which we have engraved for this week's paper.

Gen. Lee spent the latter part of his life in an abstracted and solitary manner, aloof from the awakening energy and stir of the young Republic. There was no other being in the house he occupied. His companions were his books and dogs; the latter sharing the same bill, and eating the same food, from wooden dishes, as their eccentric master. His will is a curious relic and expression of his character, and, like everything among other original sentiments, which we have not space to quote, the novel assertion that man is no more responsible for the nature of his religious opinions than for the color of his skin. The building in which Shenandoah Furnace was first put in blast is very ancient, and is an interesting monument of the olden time.

SHIPPING THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH CABLE.

THE process of shipping a portion of the submarine cable which has been made for this great undertaking from the works at Greenwich on board the Hulk Iris, for transference to the Main cable, now lying on the tanks of the Great Eastern, was commenced on Thursday, the 16th ult. The shipment was necessarily to be a long one, and will continue without intermission now until nearly the end of May, by which time it is hoped all will be completed and the vessel ready for steamship. The total quantity of rope required to connect Valentia with Bull's bay, Newfoundland, following for the 'clear' which must run out to prevent too great a strain on the cable, is about 2,300 nautical or geographical miles. When the length of a Liverpool margin is given of nearly 600 statute miles of rope or slack caused by currents, possible rough weather, and other evolutions of the ship, will be stored aboard on the cable in the deepest water. Over one part of the route the depth of water is greater than 2,000 fathoms, or nearly three statute miles—a depth, however, which is only considered of moment in case of breakage, as the great weight and tension of the cable being sufficient to bear its own weight in 11 miles of still water. In this case, indeed, the strength of the new cable has an enormous superiority over the old and ill-used rope, which was first laid, and which, in the estimation of all those who know its real condition, deserves remaining in fair working order for a few or twenty days.

Our engraving, on page 366, shows the process of running off the cable from the works into the receptacle prepared for it on board the Iris. We also give examples and longitudinal sections of the cable.

LIEUT.-GEN. GRANT'S HOUSE in Philadelphia.

ON our fourth page we exhibit a view of the mansion recently presented to Gen. Grant by some prominent citizens of Philadelphia, one of our Artists having been sent to that spot for the purpose. The edifice is in Chestnut street, west of 20th, and is of a plain, substantial and comfortable character, in a brief style of a home where a valorous soldier might happily repose with his family between the blasts of the trumpet. The donors of this testimonial souvenir have doubtless desired to fix the residence of the great commander permanently near themselves, a most natural inclination, and one that is admirably furthered by the present universal mania for making presents of residences.

SOMETHING FOR THE LADIES.—The Paris correspondent of the London Court Journal, in a letter dated January 13th, describes the latest fashion in wearing hair at the Tuileries ball on the 11th. He says: "The hair no longer hangs à Greque on the neck behind, butts bromide forward, and threatens all offenders, in helmet fashion on the command of the head. "The promissory organs," as the scientists of phrenology denominate those low foreheads, towards the nape of the neck, are found to be hitherto been concealed by the hair, now wind revealed in all its hairy indiscretion. It is a fearful thing for all along the top of the head, told. The parting rifle in front, and the short frizzy which our ancestors have replaced the tabletkeeping curls round the back from the forehead, and showing luminous forward for its best advantage. In that way the good looking that the fashion has been imposed by selection of Nature's favorites, for we search in vain for the hairdresser's connected with its introduction? The hair revealed to vote, or we understand, at the last election of officers, held at Salt Meadow—the assembly at which—that takes place twice a year, for the election of officers. Twelve young ladies are submitted to the inspection of the public of the newest thing of the great Paris hairdressers, and this year, almost by unanimity, the exposition was awarded to Leopold's coiffure Empire, and thus has ugliness proclaimed her supremacy over taste and elegance for the year."

How to cure dogs of sheep-killing? One way is to tie him on his neck in a gateway and drive a flock of sheep over him! The other way is to tie him between two sound rams—the thrusts thereof will teach him about his bad habits. An application of either of these modes of punishment will make him afraid ever to lose a sheep in the face afterwards.

PROPERTY NO. 1.—SEVENTY BARRELS OF OIL DAILY.

A perpetual lease of two and a half acres on the celebrated Buchanan Farm, at the junction of Oil Creek and Cherry Run, in Venango County, Pennsylvania, adjoining the 70 barrels daily, of which one-half goes to the First National Petroleum Company. The royalty required for the oil is equivalent to the payment of at least two per cent. upon the investment, and the remainder goes into the investments. First dividend of two per cent. for February, payable on the fifteenth of March, will be made by the Company. Engines, tools and tubing now on the leased land.

PROPERTY NO. 2.—FORTY ACRES OF THE HATCH FARM.

This property, owned in fee, lies just north of Plumer, on both sides of Cherry Run, and is the scene of the two great New Wells which have yielded 2,000 barrels daily and the new 320 barrel well on the Company's property, now being drilled by the same Company, and but a little distance from each. One hundred and forty acres lie on the south side of the Hatch Farm and Oil Creek. A large flow of oil has just been struck in the Company's verge of the property, and new wells will be sunk on the property during the Spring and Summer. Derricks will be erected and wells sunk without striking oil.

PROPERTY NO. 3.—FIVE WELLS NOW GOING DOWN.

A parcel of land on the well-known McFate Farm, on Cherry Run. Five wells are now going down, varying in depth from the depth of over 300 feet. The First National Petroleum Company has a large interest in all the oil territory, without spending a penny or doing a day's work. The Company will sink wells immediately. The interest of the barrels each, and other great wells are near by.

PROPERTY NO. 4.—117 ACRES OF THE EIGHTLIN FARM.

All on Oil Creek, just above Titusville, and owned by fee. Regarded by experienced oil operators as one of the best oil properties in Pennsylvania. Lease of the land daily examined by oil discoveries and strikes on all sides of it. Room for prospecting over 500 wells. Several will be sunk immediately.

PROPERTY NO. 5.—200 ACRES IN WEST VIRGINIA.

The lease of about 200 acres of rich oil-bearing lands on the Little Kanawha and Duckard Creek, in West Virginia, giving to the First National Petroleum Company seven-eighths of all the oil. The property is near the noted Burning Springs Well, and in the great upheaval range, which has always been found to contain oil in huge quantities. Wells will be sunk immediately.

PROPERTY NO. 6.

A lease 50 acres of first-class oil-bearing lands, also on Little Kanawha River and Duckard Creek, in the vicinity of property No. 5.

THE RESERVED SHARES—ALL STOCKHOLDERS ON AN EQUAL FOOTING.

Subscriptions will be received, until further notice, for a limited amount of reserved stock, at the lowest cash price of $3 per share, par value $5, the same being full 40 per cent. less than the present and future prices at which respect the original subscribers, and those who may purchase from them under names, stand on precisely the same footing.

THE COMPANY'S WORKING OPERATIONS.

The working operations of the company have been placed under the personal supervision of Mahlon S. Frost, Esq., of Titusville. Mr. Frost is a pioneer in the oil development of Pennsylvania, and one of the largest and most experienced oil operators in the country. All the new wells will be sunk under his immediate direction. Subscription Books now open at the COMPANY'S OFFICE, NO. 160 BROADWAY.

PINEAPPLE CIDER

is a PREVENTIVE of SICKNESS. The experience that it is a CURE for sickness, during the past two years, convinces him that it is time the public had its choice exclusively for health sickness. Dr. Talbot's Pineapple Cider is Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, designed to purify the blood and young. It is not only looking but is entirely new to the public. Dr. Talbot has been a long time in perfecting it. This is now a new mode of introducing it, nevertheless it is the same Cider that has been in use for years, to pay three dollars a year to any one desiring it, and is now offered to the public at one dollar per bottle, and as much more for the loss of time and expense of sending it, as the purchaser may choose to give. Also the compound of Medicated Pineapple Cider is a cure for dyspepsia, and a child will not first thing after you rise in the morning, and the same after each meal. It will relieve the worst cases of dyspepsia and give vigor and action to the system. A celebrated New York physician says it has proved a heavenly trial of the Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that he gained a pound of flesh in one month on the Medicated, and confirms its use as above directed, and finds it very beneficial says it has proved a perfect preventive of sickness in his case. Also, another well-known gentleman of New York has used the Pineapple Cider constantly for ten years, and has not been sick one day during that time.

HOSTETTER'S

CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is expectedly and confidently asserted at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direst poisons, under the name of medicines, and when the sick are importuned by pseudo purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit behind pernicious heralded to the worst in "secret nostrums of the day," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known, that while all the above named stimulants called liquors are impure, and while every article containing alcohol are deleterious, a fiery article containing most of it, and of a morbid character, HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contains none of these things, but are a combination of pure vegetable juices of the most valuable medicinal properties, with the purest spirits and choicest aromatics, and is offered as a remedy for Dyspepsia and all the diseases originating in a disordered stomach, to the world with a firm, not boastful confidence, that it will not have its equal or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other articles advertised in the United States, and the certificates which subscribers to the press are signed by gentlemen of the highest standing in every professional calling, and walk of life. Beware of malicious and impudent.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war having cut off the supply of cotton, a large quantity of Valuable Jewellery, originally intended for the English market, has been sent off for sale in this country, and MUST POSITIVELY BE SOLD AT ONCE!

Under these circumstances, ARRANDALE & CO., setting at defiance the usual rules of business, determined to have resolved upon a Great Gift Distribution, subject to the following terms and conditions:

CERTIFICATES, naming each article and its value, are placed in Sealed Envelopes, well mixed. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of 25 cents.

ALL ARTICLES SOLD AT ONE DOLLAR EACH, WITHOUT REGARD TO VALUE!

On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you are going to get, and then if it your option to send the dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a GOLD WATCH, Diamond Ring, or any Set of Jewellery on our list for ONE DOLLAR, and in no case can they get less than One Dollar's worth, as there are no blanks. The price of Certificates is as follows:

One for	25 cents.
Five for	1
Eleven for	2
Thirty for	5
Sixty-five for	10
One Hundred for	15

AGENTS will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided the remittance amounts to One Dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage Stamps.

ARCANA WATCH.

An Elegant Novelty in Watches.

The cases of this watch are an entirely new invention, composed of six different metals combined, rolled together and planished, producing an exact imitation of 18 carat gold, called Arcana, which will always keep its color. They are as beautiful and durable as solid gold, and are afforded at one-sixth the cost. The case is beautifully designed, with Panel and Shield for name, with Patent Push Pin, and engraved in the exact style of the celebrated Gold Hunting Levers, and are really handsome and desirable, and as exact an imitation of gold, as to defy detection. The movement is manufactured by the well-known Jas. Boss Watch Company of Europe, and are superbly finished, having engraved patent balance, Swiss pattern, adjusting regulator, fine gold balance, and the improved ruby jewelled action, with fine dial and skeleton hands, and is warranted a good timekeeper. These watches are of three different sizes, the smallest being for ladies, and are all Hunting Cases. A case of six will be sent by mail or Express for $125. A single one sent in an elegant Morocco Case for $25, will readily sell for three times their cost. We are the sole agents for this watch in the United States, and none are genuine which do not bear our Trade Mark.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWS-PAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 492—Vol. XIX.] NEW YORK, MARCH 4, 1865. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. 15 WEEKS $1 00.

Spain and Peru.

THE war which impended between Spain and Peru, and which threatened to involve the other South American republics, has been averted by negotiations, and the Chincha islands are to be restored to Peru, under conditions, however, somewhat humiliating to the latter. Spain it is true, gives up the arrogant pretension with which she started, viz: the right of revindication, or of reassuming at pleasure her dominion over such of her revolted colonies as had not been formally recognized by her as independent States, notwithstanding the fact of their independence, and in face of the fact that they have exercised all the functions of Sovereign States for more than forty years. She sacrifices but little by this surrender, since the pretension was so absurd as hardly to be accepted by the world as having been seriously made.

On the other hand, Peru is to send a Minister to Madrid, to negotiate there a treaty similar to those which Spain now has with most of the other Spanish-American States, and in which their independence is admitted. She is also to receive from Spain a Commissioner, having the same title and powers with the one which Peru refused to accept, and which refusal was the proximate pretext for the seizure of the guano islands. She is also to disavow certain alleged insults or attempted insults on Spanish officers of low rank, which she has insisted were never committed or attempted. And finally, and this is the most grievous of all, Peru is to admit the fact of a debt due to Spain, the extent to be determined hereafter, and pay the sum of $3,000,000 towards the cost of the expedition through which these demands have been enforced.

Such is the "lame and impotent conclusion" to which Peruvian preparation and bluster has come at last—a result perhaps not surprising in view of the Peruvian character, but sadly contrasting with that achieved by heroic Santo Domingo, with less than one-tenth of the population of Peru, and one-fiftieth part of its resources. And that, too, without an "American Congress" to inspire hope, encourage resistance, and promise—not furnish—aid.

It is not for us to quarrel with Peru for conducting her own affairs as she pleases, nor is it for us to object to her taste in wearing the sackcloth of humiliation, or bearing a heap of ashes rather than a crown of laurels on her head. But as a member of the guild of American republics, she had a certain duty to perform towards them. If cowardly and without shame herself, she should not confess those weaknesses in a manner to reflect on their manhood or honor. Still, the work is done, and Spain, who could not have maintained a war in the Pacific for ninety days, will sail back to the Peninsula laden with the extorted tribute of Peru—a tribute extorted by menace and not by superior power. But Peru will get back her precious guano, a treasure for which she has sacrificed her honor, and which she wastes like a spendthrift, and again resume her career of reckless extravagance. Better far that her islands had been sunk to the bottom of the sea, better even that they should have been seized and held by foreign power, than that a be should have sunk, unresistingly, into her present abasement.

We have used the terms "reckless extravagance," and accord them fully justified by the facts. Perhaps a population of about 2,500,000, of whom more than 2,000,000 are Indians, carrying nothing about public affairs, not participating in them, and eager only to keep out of the army. And yet the expenses of the Government fell but little short of $30,000,000 per annum! It is easy to perceive what corruption must exist in the administration of this sum, so disproportionate to any legitimate needs of the country. Perhaps we may discover in this extravagance the secret of the weakness of purpose and debility of principle which has placed the neck of Peru under the foot of Spain, and brought discredit on the American character.

Sailor Domingo and Peru! How different the records they have made up for history!

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Almanac for 1865.

The last edition of this volume is worth of reference in now ready. Dealers and others who desire a supply should make immediate application. It is as also at this date to bring before the public the manifold features of interest in this publication, their appreciation is fully indicated by the popular demand. The book is a complete compendium of all sorts of information in universal value. There are about two hundred distinct articles in each copy, besides the splendid engravings in oil of Grant and Farragut, executed in a high style of art. Information of this class can rarely be obtained except in such an almanac form. It is undoubtedly superior to the popular, Dr. Loudon Illustrated Almanac, while the price, 50 cents, is lower.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Illustrated Almanac for 1865.

This annual contains a greater amount of useful and entertaining information than any pamphlet of the kind ever published. It is indeed the only fully illustrated Almanac published. It is embellished with over 70 beautiful engravings by the finest artists of the day, executed in the highest style of art. It contains directions for the parlor, ball-room, boudoir, store-room, kitchen, garden, nursery and sick-room. In a word, it is the best guide, friend, as well as companion a lady's companion, and it should be found in every household. In addition to general illustrations, it contains full-length portraits of Mrs. Lincoln and Mrs. McClellan expensively engraved on steel by the popular Bellingham-Smith Branch, printed on fine paper. This complete Lady's Manual can be had by mail, postage paid, on receipt of an octave volume—costs only 50 cents. It will be sent, postage paid, on receipt of the price, either in currency or postage stamps. Address

A solid mass of information for general reference, but smothered in a perfect bubble of fun. Matters historical, literary, scientific, political, are the delight of their gloom or dulness by the pointed laughter of the cartoonist and the satirist. Wives would be contemplate the types of the year in a cheerful frame of mind may spend the some shocks of fun that can be before him and grow fat on 15 cents.

Le Moniteur des Interets Materiels says that the waste that comes from cutting furs as is found to be an excellent material for paving streets. It is run into moulds so as to form brick blocks, and allowed to cool thereby. It has been tried in Paris, and says the fashion establishment have commenced the manufacture of it. Our great avenue "Stone pavement" will soon be of fur also.

All communications will be promptly considered; and liberal prices will be paid for all manuscripts that are deemed worthy of acceptance.

Interesting narratives, love sketches, and poems of a high order of merit, if not too long, will be received with favor.

Short stories, fraught with incident, character and dramatic effect, are always preferable to long ones.

All manuscripts should be plainly written, on good paper, and on only one side of the sheets. Manuscripts written on both sides will be declined without examination.

The Beginning of the End.

"Now, by Saint Paul, the work goes bravely on."

GENERAL GRIERSON long ago proclaimed the Southern Confederacy a "mere shell," offering no resistance except its combustibles. He proved his opinion by traversing Mississippi from one end to the other, at the head of a mere handful of cavalry. Sherman has proved the same thing over a broader area in Georgia and South Carolina. The capital of the first fell into his hands without a struggle, and now we have the start of the 17th of February be occupied Columbia, the capital of South Carolina, where the first act of Secession was promulgated, and had severed every line of railway communication with the outside world, with Georgia and the South-West. This act reaches us through rebel sources, and is coupled with the humiliating admission that "this is the first time since the fall of Charleston, which has probably already commenced."

Let us now see how stand the hostile forces: Lee is entrenched in Richmond, with the bulk and flower of the rebel army; Hood is held back by Grant, in the words of the Raleigh Progress, "as in a vice." He cannot send off any considerable portion of his men southward for the reason that to do so would be to abandon Georgia without exposing himself to be overwhelmed by the vigilant and powerful enemy in his front. The forces operating against Sherman consist of two armies, Schofield's and Terry's. As regard, with perhaps a portion of Hood's dispirited army, and a detachment from Lee. These have been pushing northward in the gaps of Charleston and Wilmington, in one these points shall be evacuated." It will require a combination of all these forces to make Broad against Sherman's march, with any probability of checking his advance. It must be done, too, in order to prevent his cutting off, as he can readily do, the garrisons of Wilmington and Charleston, and thus compel their surrender in detail. In order to save their focus on the seaboard, therefore, the rebels are compelled to give up all their positions, and fall back on Richmond. Sherman is in fact driving the whole rebel herd before him, and penning them up in Virginia. He march has operated like a gigantic dragnet, sweeping up towards Richmond the restless organized rebel soldiery of the South and scout-ess. If the rebels want concentration they are certainly getting it; and, if Sherman's operations are unimpeded, they will all speedily find themselves huddled together on the edge of that "last ditch," in which, in default of victory, they have declared their intention to die.

It may be asked if Beauregard, strengthened by the garrisons of Charleston and Wilmington, may not be able to check or, perhaps, defeat Sherman? War has its contingencies, and such an event is not impossible; but, on the other hand, the abandonment of the positions named frees for Sherman's use quite as many, probably more men than will be added to Beauregard's force. Considerable bodies of cavalry from Charleston, and so have Schofield and Terry at Wilmington; no strong garrisons will be necessary to hold those places, once in our possession. The fleet will take care of them. Sherman will therefore be strengthened quite as rapidly as his antagonist, and his relative superiority sustained as he moves northward.

The result of this comprehension must be the concentration of all the rebel armies in Richmond, where, their supplies cut off by the destruction of the roads running southward, their ultimate dissolution will be only a question of time; or else Lee must abandon Richmond, and, joining Beauregard, but the combined force on Sherman, in which case the result will depend upon the celerity of Grant's movements in pursuit. A battle fought under such circumstances would be putting the life of the rebellion on a single cast, a risk which neither Lee nor Jeff Davis can be supposed undertake, but which is not in keeping with his character. There is still an alternative, namely, that Lee, evacuating Richmond and consolidating his army with Sherman, should rapidly along the eastern foot of the Alleghanies, and make a push for Georgia, where supplies are most abundant, and where he may hope to re-organize his forces, so as to prolong the struggle through another campaign, and whence he may "demonstrate" against Tennessee and Kentucky. Some such movement would, of course, involve the surrender of Virginia and North Carolina, and change materially the field of military operations, not disadvantageously for the rebels. Supposing the national armies would be compelled to operate at longer distances from their sources of supply, and in the heart of a hostile country. Our possession of Nashville and Tennessee, however, gives us a position so commanding, that the movement we are contemplating as possible could, at the worst, be only a prolongation of the conflict for a few days, and would be the same complete reindication of the national authority.

Since the above was put in type, we have the following telegraphic news: "The City of Sin," Charleston, has fallen! Laus Deo!

We stated in our last issue, that the territory of Sugar Creek promised to open up to its owners a source of wealth far exceeding in value the same amount of acres, whether gold-producing or whatever else, to be found in any part of the world. Since then we have had a opportunity to prove the truth of our assertions. Immediately adjoining the Saunders Farm, which is the property of the New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore Consolidated Petroleum and Mining Company, a well was struck that took which yielded at once fifty barrels per day, which for the first quality, was will probably, when the pumping and other necessary arrangements are completed, yield from 100 to 200 barrels per day. But with its present yield that well would bring to-day in the New York market three hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Now, what other land in the world can produce an equal this? A square yard of soil worth a third of a million of dollars to purchase outright, while the land around it is worth the original amount of over $500,000. This discovery has exhausted the value of the above company's property on Sugar Creek, at least several hundred thousands of dollars.

EVERYMORE remarks the wonderful beauty of the generation of the present now blossoming into young womanhood. They are not only finer in physique and features than the last crop of girls, but in the delicate refinement of color, tint of health and animation. There is more young beauty of the striking kind called exceptional to be met with in one day on a afternoon's walk in Broadway, than can be found in a year's diligent search in any European city. Whence this new beauty comes?

"Ah," exclaimed the peripatetic philosopher to whom we propounded the question, "ah, sir, that is Shoddy!"

"What do you mean? Is it not real—real flesh that is full and sound, and red blood that glows like the cheek of a healthy Dutch frau—"

"Tut, tut, man! You are dull of comprehension. I mean to say that this new irruption of healthful beauty is the result of shoddy. They are merchant' gers, sir, are the daughters of the new race of rich men created by the war, and who were formerly confined to the Five Points Bowery and the Fifth Ward, incognito to the eastward thereof, and scattered in country villages and hamlets. Our cobblandes, sir, if the truth be told, are exiles. They have married in and in, with the hope of keeping their blood and money in the same channel, until their wives have become ugly and their men weak and spindle-legged. Ask an old resident the name of any one of the radical creatures of to-day, at sight of whom the half-extinguished embers in our hearts flame up, albeit feebly, and he will shake his head dolefully. He doesn't know. That young fellow with shoulder-straps, however, who has just joined her, can tell you. Ten to one she is daughter of the man who contracts for the hoofs and horns of the slaughtered cattle of the army of the Potomac, or who has had a "trading permit" in the Southwest, or a Post Commissary, or something of the sort. It is wonderful, sir, how much a year or two in a well-kept seminary for young ladies, and the acquaintance of a couple of thousands, even though it be in threadbare, will do for a young girl, with any natural pretensions of beauty."

But these girls are healthful as well as handsome, and promise to make the nation rich in its career of manhood, which the war has opened for us so gloriously. They are to be the mothers of many men, and—

"That's so, provided they will only stick to the thick soles and heavy cloth surtouts which they now wear. Fashion is really becoming a little rational."

Here the philosopher lit his cigar, and relapsed into silence.

The newspapers have revived a poem by the late Edward Everett Hewitt, first published in 1841, on the great church of Santa Croce, in which are erected the monuments of "painter, sculptor, builder, lord," of Michael Angelo, Galileo and Machiavelli, and of others whose great names fill the scroll of fame. It is a poem singularly beautiful and classical. The objection of the writer to rest for ever in "Auburn's quiet shade" is realized at last:

"Rests yet unnamed—the obscure, the known—I leave; Where in one wreath are cypress and the laurel bow! But we who raise above the silent dead Shall send to after days the fame they've left behind. But not for me when I shall fall asleep Shall Santa Croce's lamps their light keep. Beyond the main, in Auburn's quiet shade, With these I'll rest—for there my bed be made; Sprays gentler branches over the hillock wave, And in sweet whispers gladness give, or grief; While flowers's great arch shall rise above my bed, Than Santa Croce cruciata's lay dead; Unknown to erring or to suffering fame, By my Lares' pagan Gentile name."

A LETTER has just been received at the Navy Department from Sir William Armstrong, the well-known English gunmaker, in which he urges this Government to imitate the example of France and Russia in strengthening his guns. Capt. Wise, of the Ordnance Bureau, has written a caustic reply, in which he tells Sir William that the Armstrong guns have been tested at Fort Pulaski to the means of testing their supposed deficiency. Upon these guns were found an inscription setting forth that they were a present from Sir William Armstrong to Jeff Davis.

ENGLAND, during her great Continental war, accumulated a debt as yet unprecedented in history. With every step of its growth, the air was filled with the wails of financial prophets, the burthen of whose predictions was approaching if not immediate bankruptcy and national ruin. Yet, in the days of Lord Macaulay, "that hoary-bearded and bankrupt society not only proved able to meet all its obligations, but while meeting them, grew richer and richer so fast, that its growth could almost be discerned by the eye." What was true of Great Britain is now true, and likely to continue to be true in the future, of the United States. The error of the alarmists of England was that into which the corresponding class in our own country, both North and South, is thus clearly defined by the author to whom we have referred:

"They erroneously imagined that there was an exact analogy between the case of an individual who is in debt to another individual, and the case of society which is in debt to a part of itself. They forgot that the error not less serious, touching its resources of the country. They forgot that the true test for the solvency is the incessant presence of every experimental science, and by the industry which is at every point to get on in life. They saw that the debt grew, and they forgot that other things grew as well as the debt."

Summary of the War.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

COLUMBIA, the capital of South Carolina, was captured without resistance by Gen. Sherman's army on the 17th of Feb., the rebel forces under Beauregard retiring the previous day, to what part is unknown.

From Gen. Beauregard's dispatch it appears that the rebels were burning cotton and preparing the south bank of the Congaree, and three a number of shells into the city. During the night they moved up to Granby, and on the 18th, fired the Saluda and Broad rivers. Whilst they were crossing these rivers the troops, under Gen. Beauregard, evacuated Columbia, everything soon after took possession.

The Richmond papers acknowledge that the capture of Columbia necessitates the fall of Charleston. The Charleston Mercury of the 18th of February announces the evacuation of that paper, and the Richmond papers indicates contemplated removal to another locality.

Our readers will perceive by the illustrations on our present paper that operations have been recommenced against Charleston, our troops having landed on James Island, where they are concentrating.

NORTH CAROLINA.

The Union troops under Gens. Terry and Schofield are those of the army between Wilmington, whose fall we may expect to hear at any moment.

VIRGINIA.

The only military operations were a continuous picket firing for three hours in front of Petersburg, and some artillery firing for a short time on the Rich mst. A sudden and apparently an impulsive attack was made on Friday morning by the rebels on the pickets of Gen. Ferrero's division, 24th corps, in front of the Burnsides defences, but they were driven back by the colored troops with considerable loss.

Gen. Lee has issued an order on assuming command of all the rebel armies. He still retains personal supervision of the army of Northern Virginia, and his headquarters are with that organization.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE British Parliament met on the 7th Feb. The Lord Chancellor read the Queen's Speech. The only paragraph interesting to us was this:

"The civil war in North America still unhappily continues. Her Majesty remains steadfastly neutral between the contending parties, and would rejoice at a friendly reconciliation between them."

In the debates that followed a far greater view was taken of the present war. Earl Russell frankly acknowledged that he thought the United States were justified in increasing their armed force upon the lakes, and that we had great grounds of complaint against England for the privateers that had been fitted out in British ports to prey upon American commerce. He also thought the rebel raids organized in Canada were gross outrages, and ought to be prevented and their perpetrators punished. The fall of Fort Fisher had been much commented on. In relating the attack by Admiral Porter's fleet, the London Times says:

"The most important fact brought out by the last American experience is, without doubt, the possibility of making turret-ships which shall be seagoing. The Monadnock has proved this. A well-built ironclad ought to be able to beat a turret-ship in sailing, whatever may be her deficiencies in other respects. But if a turret-ship be proved to be seagoing, she must, under ordinary circumstances, and, setting speed aside, be superior to a more ironclad. A turret-ship is, in fact, a movable fort, capable of mounting any weight of guns."

There had been an important meeting of the French Privy Council to take into consideration the affairs of North America and their intimate connection with the Mexican Empire. The recent resolutions of the Washington Senate must have assisted in increasing this uneasiness. Nevertheless, according to the correspondent, the discussion in which the Privy Council was engaged ended in this resolution—that for the moment it would be wrong to give way to exaggerated fears; and that, in the face of the pacific and conciliatory assurances which American diplomacy continues to give, the best course to adopt is to abstain provisionally from all movement, without, however, indulging in a false security.

The Moniteur says: "All reports which have been circulated in reference to a cession made to France by Mexico of Sonora and other provinces are absolutely fabrications."

It appears certain that one of the Franco-Danish rams had escaped to sea—under the rebel flag.

TOWN GOSSIP.

MRS. LANDER has been delighting her audiences with "Adrienne, the Actress," a play in which some years since she created a great sensation. Certainly she has succeeded in reviving her former triumph in the part, and we think, even, that the pathetic scenes have a deeper pathos—she shows, if possible, a still keener appreciation of every point of the difficult character, and a more irresistible strength in the tragic passages. In short, she gives a more conclusive proof than the play in which she first appeared allowed, that her season of retirement has only quickened her perceptions of the beautiful and true, and increased her powers of developing the conceptions which her imagination seizes so vividly.

Since "Adrienne," Mrs. Lander has appeared in Knowles's play of "Love" and the "Belle's Stratagem," in both of which, it is needless to say, her success has been complete.

It is said that "Hamlet" is to go into retirement, and Booth to have an opportunity to add to his laurels by the production of some fresh piece.

We have had all manner of excellent things at Wallack's. John Brougham's best comedy, the "Game of Life," among them, and a new drama is promised as soon as the season of benefits shall be over.

At Barnum's "Azucena" is still as popular as ever, and this week a new piece, written by Miss Laura Keene, will be produced, which the manager prophesies, and no doubt correctly, will create a great sensation among his patrons.

A large crowd was gathered at the Cooper Institute last Friday evening, on the occasion of the Junior Exhibition of the Free Academy. The exercises were of a varied character, and exceedingly interesting, the young gentlemen doing themselves and their instructors the utmost credit.

At the opera we have had "Ernani" at last, after one or two vexatious delays, with Zucchi more brilliant than ever after her brief illness. Between the disappointments Miss Kellogg sang in "Faust," and the debutante, Mrs. Van Zandt, appeared as Lucia.

We had several days last week when the sky would not have disgraced May, and the air was so balmy and soft that one was tempted to discard overcoat and mufflers, and be overtaken by a cold in the head in consequence. But under foot—language can find no comparison to describe the horrible state of the streets. Every crossing was worse than the passage of the river Styx, and instead of one Charon there were forty, in the shape of youthful sweepers, clamorous for coppers and splashing the mud in your face from the energy with which they dashed their brooms right and left to earn their pennies.

Club windows were crowded with moustached elegants on the watch for pretty feet, and one or two elderly dandies, in particular, certainly did not give themselves time even to eat their luncheon. Verily, they had their reward; for the turn out in the way of stunning little boots was a sight only to be met with in Gotham.

We saw, the other day, at Clarke's Photographic Gallery, a most admirable collection of pictures of celebrities of all sorts, and we advise those who have a weakness for collecting portraits of famous people, to pay a visit to the same place. The photographs are taken in that charming manner for which Clarke has made himself so well known, and the collection is probably the most complete in this country.

Among other things that everybody is talking about, is the new novel "The Morrisons," and a book so entirely different from the ordinary run of American novels, that it is really a pleasure to meet it. Does any one know who wrote it? We confess our ignorance, and though usually it is a great bore to have people tell you things, and be forced to know things, in this particular case we should like to break over our own rule of never asking questions, and never listening to volunteered information.

Last Thursday the annual ball of the German Liederkranz took place at the Academy of Music, with all sorts of fun and jollity and an immense crowd, in spite of the efforts of the managers to keep the number of tickets issued within reasonable bounds. The building was decorated with beautiful taste, and we never saw so many droll objects in the way of masks and fancy dresses.

Saint Valentine's day evidently was not supposed to pass unnoticed, judging from the display of wonderful missives in the shop windows, covered with the most astounding devices in all the hues of the rainbow. The ancient custom has been less and less generally observed on each succeeding of the anniversary for years, but after all, it seems a pity to see the old fashion given up. Very foolish and absurd it was, no doubt; our grandfathers might have thought it a pretty way to send a love token, and our grandmothers have taken pleasure in guessing which among the captive swains had forwarded the bleeding heart and Cupid's arrows, but naturally our modern beaux and belles are far beyond such paltry amusements. Instead of valentines, if we only grow a little more refined and ridiculous, we shall discard the king's English altogether, write notes of invitation in bad French and utter insane sounding Italian exclamations at the opera, like the "noblest Roman of them all." Nothing can be more amusing than that habit of interlarding conversation with ejaculations in foreign tongues, breaking up letters with spasms of Tuscan and German groans, and nothing more vulgar. There is only one other thing that provokes us still farther beyond endurance, and that is the habit of twisting female names into some fanciful abbreviation.

The idea seems to have started among the literary ranks—for years past if a writer essayed the romantic line she must style herself Floy Flowervale or Lilly Lillyford, or some other equally euphonious and impossible cognomen, and if she wished to indite letters from the country, unfolding her attachment to every thing picturesque, nothing would answer but to give herself a name as pastoral as if she were a shepherdess with a crook and as redolent of rural associations as a clover field.

Frankly, all this is sheer nonsense, and the worst of it is the contagion has spread like the measles, and every young girl feels it her duty to twist her baptismal appellation into something as romantic and unchristian as possible.

We no longer recognise the daughters of our best friends—Eunice has budded into Lulie—Margaret lapsed into Maggie, and so on through the whole catalogue. If a girl is born Sophronia Jenkins let her stay plain Sophronia until some sensible man changes it to something else, a thing he will be much more likely to do than if she had given it a spasmodic contraction into Ina.

Any other folly is more endurable—let girls never relate the simplest fact without embroidering it highly—let them work pugnosed monsters in Berlin wool; after all, puppies are but puppies, and those worked in fancy stitch are more endurable than the shirt-collared ones—let them dance the galop for five mortal hours and be called on by their mothers next day—flirt—eat ices—stand in a draught of air when heated with waltzing—wear out youth as fast as possible and rush into jaded and hollow-cheeked maturity—but for their own sakes and everybody's sake concerned let them retain one spark of good sense and hold fast to the name given by the dear old grandparents when they bent over the cradle and asked God's blessing on the innocent, little dreaming that in 10 years baby would know so much more than they ever did.

Is there no way of preventing the use of that horrible word "smart," which one would really think the groundwork upon which our American vocabulary is built? If a man robs a bank and goes off to Colorado it is pronounced a "smart thing," and the same term is applied to every species of fraud and swindle. Are we really so blunted in our moral sensibilities that we see the criminal's "smartness" so much more plainly than the enormity of the offence? It certainly could do us no harm to call things occasionally by their right names, and if by so doing we could get rid of the detestable word which haunts us at every turn, it would be almost equal to some new and wonderful principle of moral reform.

"An educated literary man" in Philadelphia is out with an advertisement which is the most remarkable affair in its nature and composition that we have seen in an age. He offers to write anything, from a sensation preacher's sermon down to an acrostic, in every known tongue—from plain English to the choicest Arabic, and all on the most moderate terms, provided he sees the greenbacks in advance. So henceforth there is no reason why everything in a literary way should not be well done by those who have more money than ability to spare.

If the wonderful man only succeeds in his undertaking there will be an end of stupid addresses in public—literature will be worth treasuring, and best of all, a great deal of trouble saved those who can afford to be idle—one's idea of perfect bliss, by the way.

How shall we escape, who groan under the tyranny of button-secreting and clothes-mangling washerwomen—those harpies who keep our collars and give us in exchange socks from some giant's wardrobe! Our champions charge upon the scene, bearing faultless collars that never have to be washed, but bloom like lilies, only longer, and then close their spotless lives in the dustpan. The names of these knights are Tainter and Jackson, of 536 Pearl street, and what we mean is that they get up the most wonderful paper collars that ever were invented, and when they die—may their shadows not grow less for a thousand years—will deserve a monument at the hands of the countless hosts of bachelors whom they have preserved from despair.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The snow is from four to five feet deep in the northern part of Maine, Vermont and New York. Along the seacoast of Maine it is about two feet deep. In the White Mountain region snow has fallen to a great depth. Some of the drifts in the roads are from 12 to 15 feet deep, and the snow is so dry that the wind blows it into the most fantastic shapes.

—— At a recent Sunday meeting of the Mormons, at their tabernacle, in Salt Lake City, one G. Q. Cannon, who was afterwards seconded by Brother Brigham Young himself, denounced the "Gentiles," or unbelievers, in their midst in unmeasured terms, and declared that in "nine months Utah would be as free of Gentiles as the President's message is of reference to Utah."

—— The votes of Maine and California were nearly equal at the late Presidential election. Maine polled 106,140 votes; California, 105,973, excluding several precincts for informality in the returns. In Maine the majority for Lincoln was 17,314; in California, 18,530.

—— The late Joseph Noble, of New York, bequeathed $1,000 to each of the following associations in Boston, viz.: Baptist Missionary Union, American Baptist Publication Society, American Baptist Foreign Bible Society, American Tract Society, and the Fatherless and Widows' Society.

—— The Governor of Iowa has called an extra session of the Legislature of that State, for the purpose of ratifying the Constitutional amendment abolishing slavery.

—— Ignatz Ratzky, who has been in prison since 1862, under sentence of death for murdering Sigismund Fellner, is to be resentenced under the law of 1860, which in effect respites his life for another year; in the interim, he is to be kept at hard labor till the day of his execution.

—— Butter is falling rapidly in price in Boston. A heavy decline will soon take place in other cities.

—— The estate of the late Col. Colt, of Hartford, of revolver fame, has an income of $155,018, the largest in the State.

—— The new tax bill which is now before the House exempts from taxation schoolbooks and "all books printed by religious societies exclusively for the use of Sunday schools."

—— The Illinois Legislature has passed a bill appropriating $25,000 for the purchase of the burial place of the late Stephen A. Douglas.

—— A bill taxing foreign insurance companies 7 per cent. on the business done by them in the State has passed the Illinois Senate.

—— The Rev. Mr. Garnett, a colored minister, preached, on the 12th inst., in the hall of the House of Representatives, to a large audience, attracted to hear the first negro preacher that had ever raised his voice in the hall.

—— The libel suit Count Joannes v. Horace Greeley, after three days' trial, resulted in a verdict for the defendant.

—— A correspondent of the Newburg Journal, of the 11th inst., says that he saw in that village, on that day, the widow and two children of a soldier, who had died while bravely battling for his country, turned into the street by her landlord for want of a month's rent on the day it was due! and one of the children too sick to raise its head from the pillow. Why does not the Newburg Journal give the landlord's name?

—— Recruiting is going on at the rate of 100 a day. The military authorities are much more exacting now than they have been.

—— The shrewdest men are opinion that house-rent will come down very rapidly in the course of a few months. It is only the rebellion that keeps it up.

—— Both houses of Congress have passed the bill providing for the establishment of a steamship line across the north Pacific Ocean from San Francisco to to China.

Western.—Of the 25 members of the Illinois Senate not one is a native of that State, while five are natives of Ohio and two of Indiana. And yet southern Illinois was considerably settled before the wilderness was broken in Ohio. Of the 85 members of the House, 11 are natives of that State and 10 of Ohio.

Southern.—Gen. W. P. Wofford is on his way to North Georgia, with orders from the war department to take command of that department, for the purpose of breaking up all unauthorised military organizations, etc.

—— A committee of the rebel House of Representatives report a list of "persons who charged the government the unexampled price of $40 and $30 a bushel for their wheat." The first name on the list is that of Hon. James Seddon, who sold 230 bushels at $40 per bushel.

—— The Mobile Tribune gives the following as some of the prices in that market: "Flour has advanced to $250 to $300 per barrel; sugar, $8 and $10 per pound; corn, $6 to $7 per bushel; lard, $3 50 to $3 75; butter (very scarce), $8 to $8 50 per pound; fresh beef $1 to $1 50; pork, $1 50 to $1 75; and other articles in like proportion."

—— The Southern press has recently commenced a series of such bitter attacks upon Jeff Davis and his cabinet that there can be no doubt as to freedom of speech and publication in Secessia.

Military.—Major-Gen. Gilmore has been appointed to the command of the Department of the South, vice Major-Gen. Foster, who comes North on a furlough.

—— Col. Baker has returned from Washington to New York, armed with ample powers to try the men he has lately arrested for enlistment frauds; he also intends to make the bounty brokers restore as far as possible the money they have robbed the recruits of.

—— It is calculated that the enlistment frauds amount to over 270,000 men. It seems incredible; but when it is borne in mind that the drafts amount together to nearly 2,000,000 of men, it is just probable. This will account for enormous fortunes made by some of our most disreputable citizens. To these bounty-jumpers and recruiting offices may be attributed the continuance of the war.

—— The following table shows the distances from each other of the places which are now the chief points of interest in the military field:

From.	Miles.
Branchville to Charleston	62
Branchville to Kingville	45
Branchville to Florence	108
Branchville to Columbia	68
Branchville to Augusta	75
Branchville to Wilmington	216
Branchville to Charlotte	174
Charleston to Florence	102
Wilmington to Florence	107

Personal.—Andrew Jackson Donelson, candidate for Vice-President on the Fillmore ticket, in 1856, has returned to Nashville, from rebeldom, and taken the oath of allegiance.

—— Samuel Warren, the author of "Ten Thousand a Year," is lying very sick in London, and not expected to recover.

—— the editor of the Raleigh Recorder says: "The editor of the Recorder is now absent, looking up supplies for his family, and in his absence he would call attention to a much neglected duty of our people, that of praying for the editor of their religious journal. Brethren, pray for him; you pray for your pastors, your Sabbath school superintendents, your deacons, and other officers of the church—why not pray for him? He needs your prayers, and feels the need of them."

—— Hood is in Richmond. It is reported that he will go to Paris, where his fiancé, Miss Preston, is at present.

—— Gen. Joe Johnstone, whom Jeff Davis has a great antipathy to, is cultivating a small farm he has near Montgomery, Alabama. It is said that he openly pronounces the rebellion a failure.

—— Mr. Memminger has coolly announced that with regard to the 400,000,000 not placed in the schedule, it was a mere omission.

—— Mr. John Harrington, formerly of the New York Atlas, and a well-known writer, has been appointed editor of the Philadelphia Mercury, a paper of considerable liveliness and circulation.

—— Mr. Vincent Wallace is recovering rapidly from his serious illness.

—— John Brougham, the dramatist, actor and manager, has been starring in Ireland with great success. His horse-play, called "The Daughter of the Sun," written for Miss Menkins, has been a great success. The life of that actress, recently published in London, has called forth very severe criticisms. John Bull will not make any allowance for theatrical exaggeration.

Obituary.—Mr. Leitch Ritchie died lately at Greenwich, near London. He was well-known in literary circles, and was for some time the literary editor of Chambers's Journal.

—— Archdeacon Hoare of Winchester, is dead. In his youth he was rather a precocious poet. In his later years he wrote profusely in prose, and among his numerous other works on religious subjects his "Infant Baptism Spiritually Explained," published in 1848, and his "Lectures on Divine Judgments," in 1852, are perhaps the best known. At the time of his death the Archdeacon was in his 84th year.

—— The last advices from Europe announce the death of possibly the oldest person in Europe, Signora Maddalena Annunciata, who died in Rome, aged 122 years.

—— The Baron de Bazancourt, the historian of the wars in the Crimea and Italy, died recently in Paris, after a brief illness.

—— The Paris correspondent of the London News says: "Monsieur J. Boniface, whose literary name, X. B. Saintine, is well known as the author of 'Picciola,' died here on the 22d of January. Few readers can have forgotten his charming novel of 'Picciola,' which has become almost a household book. M. Saintine was honorary president of the Société des Gens de Lettres."

—— Mr. Charles R. Rode, formerly publisher of the New York City Directory, died in New York on the 12th inst. Mr. Rode was also publisher of the Criterion, a short-lived literary journal, and subsequently he took charge of the Publisher's Circular. He was also actively engaged on "Appleton's American Encyclopædia," and contributed to Harper's and other magazines. A few years ago Mr. Rode's health failed, and a number of his friends among the publishers of New York, Boston and Philadelphia presented him with the means of travelling in Europe.

—— On the 17th inst., at Cambridge, Mass., George P. Bond, Director of the Observatory of Harvard College. He was a graduate of the institution in 1845, and was one of the most eminent astronomers of the time. On the death of his father he was placed at the head of the observatory.

—— Col. W. A. Bartlett died recently in New York, aged 49. He was the father of the bride of the diamond wedding, so much talked of some five or six years ago.

—— Gov. Bennett, of South Carolina, died in Columbia last week. He was one of those who soon beheld the folly of the rebellion.

Accidents and Offences.—A gang of youthful burglars, the eldest only 17, and which has been committing numerous depredations for the last three months, was captured last week.

—— Theodore Yates, who was to have been hanged on the 17th March, for the murder of Policeman Curran, in Brooklyn, has received a respite for a week, the day formerly named being St. Patrick's day.

—— Bernard Friery has been found guilty of murdering Harry Lazarus. The verdict was murder in the first degree.

—— A young man, who represented himself as the son of the millionaire A. T. Stewart, has been making love to the ladies of Albany, and depleting the purses of the gentlemen of that city.

Foreign.—The French papers, official and semi-official, give it up at last that the condition of the Confederacy is desperate, and they have got over calling Sherman's march through Georgia a "forced retreat." On the contrary, they admit his march to be one of the most extraordinary feats in military history, and put him down in the list of the great Generals of the world.

—— There is every prospect of more trouble with the Japanese, in consequence of the murder of two more British officers. For the murder of the former two an indemnity of $3,000,000 was demanded, which has lately been paid. The correspondent of the New York Tribune very properly observes, that as long as money is considered an equivalent for human life there will be no end to these cowardly assassinations.

—— The Liverpool Times says the merchants and traders of Bombay have reaped a golden harvest in consequence of the civil war in this country, through the impetus it has given to the cotton trade of India. Immense fortunes have been made by all largely engaged in the work of producing and stimulating the growing of cotton. Millionaires abound. Clerks with small salaries have had their fortunes swelled out to gigantic proportions.

—— A recent traveller in "la belle France," makes the damaging observation that the country French are as degraded a race as he ever saw. They are small and weak, and statistics show that the drain on the male population by the conscription is continually diminishing their height and strength.

—— It being necessary to excavate near a nunnery in Charenton, France, the fragments of nearly 800 infant skeletons were found. It has caused a great scandal, as the order of the nuns was of the strictest.

—— The Surrey Theatre was burnt to the ground on the night of the 30th of January. It was situated about a mile on the southern side of the river Thames, and was principally renowned for having been the Elba to which the famous comedian Elliston retired after he had lost Drury Lane.

—— An extraordinary and fatal explosion of gas occurred on the 25th ult., at the Bridge of Austerlitz, opposite the Jardin des Plantes, Paris. Half a dozen people were killed on the spot, their heads and limbs being scattered about in a frightful manner. Several yards of foot pavement in the neighborhood of the bridge were blown up.

Art, Science and Literature.—Renan's Life of Jesus has called forth over two hundred replies, some of them ponderous volumes.

—— Fitzhugh Ludlow, in his Overland route to California, found between Utah and the Humboldt Mountains a large desert composed, as he says, "of sand of snowy alkali," and what is more remarkable, he informs us that "in its crudest state the alkaline earth of the Desert is sufficiently pure to make violent effervescence with acids. No elaborate process is required to turn it into commercial soda and potash."

—— A letter in the London Times, from a distinguished English metallurgist, gives some interesting particulars respecting the new gun metal lately invented in Austria by Baron von Rosthorn. He says: "The new alloy which has received the name of "sterrometal," from a Greek word signifying tough or firm, is composed of copper, spelter, iron and tin, in proportions that may be slightly varied without much affecting the result. In color it resembles brass rather than gun metal; it is very close in its grain, and free from porosity. It is possessed of considerable hardness, and will take a very fine polish. Several eminent Vienna engineers have tried it for the cylinders of hydraulic presses with great success. The writer gives it as his opinion that the days of wrought iron are numbered, and that its place will be soon supplied by steel in some form or other.

—— The model of the new electro-magnetic locomotive is now exhibited at Versailles. Its inventors MM. Bellet and Rouve, assert that locomotives constructed on their principle could travel on ordinary railroads at the rate of 124 miles an hour! The power is obtained by magnetizing and demagnetizing, by means of a current supplied by a fixed battery, and, it is said, utilizes only a small part of the force developed.

—— According to a French provisional paper, the Emperor has just completed a book, which will be read with even more curiosity than his Life of Julius Cæsar; it bears the title of "Henri Quatre et sa Politique."

—— In 1864 there were published in England 3,553 new works and new editions, including pamphlets. Of these there were of religious, 715; biography and history, 233; geography, topography, and books of travel, 151; fiction, including juvenile works, 842; poetry and general literature, 565; annuals and new serials, 166; law and parliamentary, 79; medical and surgical, 124; European and classical philology, including translations, 132; English philology and education, 177: naval, military and engineering, 62; politics and questions of the day, 56; agriculture, horticulture, field sports, 46; art, architecture, &c., 52; commercial, 41; science and natural history, 122.

Chit-Chat.—A friend observed to Judge Kelly, the day after Field, of Louisiana, stabbed him, that he regarded the assault as an earnest desire to restore the Union as it was.

—— Since the death of Leech, Punch has fallen very much off. It is now reduced to illustrate puns and plays upon words. In a recent number it had an illustration on this: "I say, boy, where does this road go to?" "I don't know, sir," replied the boy, "'taint been nowhere since I've been here!"

—— A Cincinnati paper, speaking of the overthrow of the rebels at Atlanta, says that just before the Federal troops entered the town, an Indiana company, almost worn out with the march, were straggling along with very little regard to order. Hurrying up to his men, the captain shouted, "Close up! close up! If the enemy were to fire when you're straggling along this way, they couldn't hit a cussed one of you." And the boys closed up immediately.

—— The meaning of the number on spools of thread is the number of hanks to the pound; each hank measures 840 yards.

—— A clergyman was lately depicting, before a deeply interested audience, the alarming increase of intemperance, when he astonished his hearers by exclaiming: "A young man in my neighborhood died very suddenly last Sunday, while I was preaching the Gospel in a beastly state of intoxication!"

—— A French paper reports a special meeting of French gourmets, whose aim and object in life is to produce some new dish. The latest novelty their combined wisdom has been able to devise is lobster boiled in champagne.

—— The Independence states that a man was killed recently, in the Hotel Dieu, Paris, by an overdose of chloroform. A celebrated professor amputated his arm without perceiving that the patient was dead, and the spectators were equally mistaken.

THE TREASURY COURT.

BY HENRY A. BLOOD.

Six trees there stand in the Treasury Court,
And the leaves of five are green;
But the leaves of one are yellow as gold,
While the fountain flies between.

Under the trees in the high-walled court
The Treasury genii sleep;
But they watch in their sleep with itdless eyes
O'er many a vault and keep.

I wish you might stand in the Treasury Court,
Where the fountain speaks and shines,
And gaze at the lofty four square walls,
And the windows all in lines.

I wish you might stand where the large green tree,
Or the golden-leaved tree, now stands,
And catch at the windows above a glance
Or a gleam of snowy hands.

For so you might fairly think you stood
In the inner courts of a king—
An Arabian king, who had for slaves
The genii of the ring.

Ah, but there is a monarch within,
And a very stern monarch is he;
And the genii that sleep in the high-walled court
Are wars of his wrathful c'e.

The stern king's dangerous wrath they fear,
They fear, if they do not hold
Safe for the soldier in every keep
The soldier's well-earned gold.

Gold for the braves with Sheridan!
Gold for the braves with Grant!
Gold for the Union braves where'er
Their martial feet they plant.

For ever thus in the Treasury Court,
Mid the green leaves or the dry,
With ruthless orbs on the watch and ward
The Treasury watchdogs lie.

King Fesenden, he is the king so stern;
But so long as the stern king reigns
The soldier may sleep, while the genii watch,
For the soldier will get his gains.

WHY I MARRIED A REJECTED SUITOR.

BY CLAIRE CROFTON.

THE dull November day was drawing to a close. During the last half hour, as I had flitted to and fro between kitchen and pantry, making ready for the evening meal, I had paused repeatedly by the window, and sent my glance across the broad fields that intervened between the home and the public road, expecting momentarily to see the glistening horns of cattle rising the brow of the hill, the forerunner of my father's approach. But no living thing met my view. So, having moaked my biscuit and set them to rise, I ran out into the yard, and leaning on the gate, peered earnestly through the gathering shades of twilight, hoping to catch a glimpse of the expected one. A dense fog was rolling slowly inland. Already the low meadow lands lying to the east were whelmed beneath the advancing tide, while here and there a solitary tree lifted its tall head above the white impalpable billows, looking like the huge mast of some giant mun-of-war beathed on that silent spectral ocean. A light breeze just lifted the slender needles of the two great pines that stood like grim sentinels on either side of the gate, and made mournful music amid their branches, sounding like the low wash of waves on some far-off shore. Our house, a large, old-fashioned, gable-roofed farmhouse, surrounded by half a score of outbuildings, was situated in the most central part of my father's farm, a full quarter of a mile from the highway, and more than half a mile from any neighbors. It was a lonesome situation, but accustomed to it from childhood, I seldom felt its isolation. My father was a drover, and he had left home early that morning for the purpose of purchasing cattle in a neighboring town, intending to return before nightfall. This arrangement was the more necessary, as my two brothers were away from home, and in my father's absence, I was left alone with my invalid mother, and charged to have the care of things indoor and out. As I stood there leaning over the gate, and carelessly humming an air got to be found in any modern opera, the figure of a man emerged from the fog and came slowly up the long lane that served as a thoroughfare to all in the neighborhood who, in going to and from the village, preferred a short cut across the fields to the longer route by the public road. As the man drew nearer I recognised our neighbor Dutton.

"Good evenin', Miss Em'ly," he said, halting as he came within speaking distance. "Watchin' for your father, I take it."

I answered in the affirmative.

"Wall, I'm sarcumspectly of the 'pinion that the squire won't reach home to-night. It's the talk at the village that the bridge over the little Dogscot has bin harrid off by the freshet, and if so be that it's a fact your father will have to go round by Sunkhaze, a matter of some six or seven miles furder, an' he'll skersely tempt gittin' thro' with his critters to-night. It's skeary work drivin' cattle after nightfall, 'pecually in sich travellin' as 'tis now."

"Nevertheless I am confident that he will come. He is not one to be daunted by trifles, you know, and he will be very unwilling to remain away from home all night."

"She is more comforbible, thank you. Any news at the village, Mr. Dutton?"

"Not's I knows on. Stay—I did hear tell that Nat Thorndyck got back to his old ha'nts once more."

THE ROBBER THROWS OFF HIS DISGUISE.

Thorndyck! what, has he broken out of prison?"

"Not jest. He's sarved his time out. Warn't sentenced for only five year, you know. Just at the time the judge had utter made it ten year it's day, 'twas sich an aggervated case of wholesale fruit an' hurtry. I'm sorry he's loose again. He's a dang'rous feller, an' I suspicion we shall hear of somebody's bein' robbed, or hav'in' their throats cut, of he's towed to provil round the country."

"Not so bad as that, I trust," I said, smiling; "he may have reformed."

"Wall, I never did put much faith of a wolf's reforming, or a panther's gittin' much like an'lowin' his taste for blood, not as I knows on," said the old man drily. "But howsomever I must be jogging, or my old woman 'll think sumthin's happened me, though, bless Emily!" And he prodded along homeward.

I half turned to re-enter the house, but paused and lingered by the gate, though I would scarcely confess to myself my motive in doing so. I had ceased to expect my father's return until a late hour. He had been obliged to go so much out of his way, I knew that he could not arrive before ten or eleven at night. But I will own that the fact of Wilfrid Stacy would take the path across the fields on his return from his day's work in the village, and I had no objection to encounter him during young georgie, albeit, it must be confessed, we had not been on the best of terms of late. Some romance are born dirts, and I think he was one of them. Having the misfortune to be the acknowledged belle of our little village, my natural propensity to coquetry had been fostered and strengthened by the homage paid to my charms by my rural admirers. After all, it was perhaps as much their fault as mine that I allowed them so many privileges, capable only of affording me amusement. Were there no slaves, the race of tyrants would soon become extinct, and when girls refuse to retain their common sense in affairs of the heart, and refuse to be led blindfolded at the will of some fair syren, when they would set the example of doing openly and honestly in love as in other affairs, then, and only then, will women discard coquetry and learn to practice frankness and candor in turn.

For my own part, I coquetted unmercifully with my would-be lovers, and was secretly of opinion that I possessed a fair field of my own whereon to trust himself within the sphere of my attractions. But with Wilfrid Stacy I found this altogether an unprincipled game. Try as I would, I could not wind him around my finger. I think he loved me sincerely; but he had too much manliness of character to become the slave of my whims. And when, after having encouraged him by sweet smiles and gentle words, and I believed myself sure of his affection, I proceeded to test my power over him by an assumption of coldness and indifference, I found, to my surprise, that instead of the tender uneasiness or regret at my altered manner, and suing for a return of favor as others had done, he chose to meet me on my own ground, and by the use of weapons, which in wicked so skilfully, that I was obliged to confess myself foiled. This piqued me, and I called to my aid all the resources of a woman's ingenuity to provoke him to some display of jealousy. The result was a downright quarrel, and for weeks we had only exchanged a cold bow when we chanced to meet in the coldest and most formal manner. Now a secret intuition warned me of his approach. I did not even turn my head as I heard all his well-known footsteps in the path, but kept on singing in a low tone the words of a song that I knew to be a favorite of his. I had thrown a light scarf over my head, not so much to shield me from the mist, as because I knew that the bright sunlet imparted a becoming ray to my rich, brunette complexion, and set off to advantage the glossy blackness of my hair. Precisely the steps grew slower as the music ceased, but I threw my whole soul, my luring him to my side, as I had hoped it would. I ceased singing and he stepped directly in front of me.

"Good evening, Emily," he said, in a gentler tone than I had heard from his lips for a long while.

"Ah! is it you, Mr. Stacy?" I said with a start and affected surprise. "You come upon one so suddenly, that I have been waiting for my father, you did not pass him, did you?"

"No; I supposed that he had preceded me.

"He has not, and I fear he will be late, for Mr. Dutton informs me that the bridge over the Pelgreen has been carried away."

"And you are alone with your mother? It seems hardly safe, and you will be lonely sitting up for him."

"Oh, I am not one of the timid sort, you know, and I don't mind being alone."

"Perhaps you expect company," he said, eyeing me heavily as he spoke. "I will leave Frank Jefferys would be only too happy to enliven your vesper by his presence, did he know you to be alone."

"I think it very likely that he will come," I answered coolly, "and it must be confessed one could scarcely devise a more interesting and agreeable companion than Frank."

"Oh, I am willing to concede all his good qualities," said Stacy, a little scornfully. "And I suppose not the least of them, in your estimation, is his spaniel-like submission to all your caprices."

"Very considerate," I replied, laughing, and affecting him a glance, half arch, half artless, from under my long mukes. "But if Frank resembles a spaniel, as you say, you must allow that you are sometimes very, very like a bear, Wilfrid."

The look, the tone disarmed him, as I meant it should. I saw the momentary struggle with his pride. Then he drew closer, and laid both his hands on mine, which rested on the topmost bar of the gate. His brown cheek glowed, and there was a new and tender light in his loud, blue eyes. "Milly," he said, giving me the pet name by which I was always called in my own family, "I verily believe that you are a witch, for you draw me to you whether I will or not; but you cannot keep me without my own consent. And now, Milly, you must decide, once and for all, what shall be our future relations to each other. I offer you a true and honest heart; it is yours if you will accept it and value it aright, but I will not have it made a plaything of. You shall not trifle with me now and flout me the next, as you do with the rest of your suitors. I must be all to you or nothing. I must be loved for love, and expect from your part in return for devotion on mine. I am too proud to let any woman, however dear to me, set her foot on my neck. I am a better friend for master than slave. Can you love me as I am? I await your answer. It will not break my heart if you refuse me."

Why need he have said that? Why not have trusted to my better nature, which was already fast melting in his bold, manly tones, and showed so imperious even in his gentleness, so much confidence mingled with his love, that it angered me. My spirit rose up in arms at such presumptuous wooing, and I answered haughtily:

"I suppose I ought to feel highly honored by your generous offer, Mr. Stacy," I said, "but I expected gratefully that you are willing to take me on any terms, but I don't seem to appreciate your condescension as it deserves. I prefer the position with regard to my conduct towards you or any other person, and as for the love you profess, it is surrounded on all sides by reserve which will render it utterly valueless in my eyes. I decline your offer decidedly, and am happy to know that in so doing I shall not occasion you any unpleasant feelings."

The flush and glow all faded out of his face when I was speaking, and were succeeded by a hard and stern expression.

"Emily," he said, "I believe you are utterly heartless. I will not trouble you with my words as to love you. But the spell is broken now. Henceforth you have no power to wound me, and you may regret when too late that you have so lightly cast aside."

He held my wrist in his strong grasp while he spoke, unconscious of the pain which the fierce pressure was almost crushing, till an involuntary gesture of pain on my part made him relinquish his hold.

I shall certainly feel the loss of so gentle a wooer," I said, sarcastically, pointing to the bruise, as it already began to show itself on my white wrist. He gazed at it a moment in silence. There was no anger in his face now, only sadness and sometimes during the day I was struck with which he regarded me, as he said, gravely:

"Pardon my unconscious violence, Emily. I am very sorry for it. You can afford to forgive me, as it is the last time I shall trouble you. Farewell. I will try to think of you as kindly as I may."

He turned and walked swiftly away. A very few paces carried him out of sight, but I stood where I had no heart to exult over my triumph—if triumph it could be called, and it was with a slow and heavy step that I re-entered the house.

I found my mother uneasy at my father's nonarrival, and when I repeated neighbor Dutton's message, she looked grave, but was not much inclined to alarm. Naturally of a firm, beautiful and courageous disposition, long illness had weakened her naturally strong nerves, and I found her fitful, nervous, timid and desponding, and it required all our loving care to keep her from sinking into a state bordering on imbecility.

"It is so unsafe," she kept repeating, "for us to be left alone with such a sum of money in the house."

"But father will certainly return," I said, "even if he has to leave his cattle behind. You know he said, when he went away, that he hoped he should be back to-night, and he always keeps his word."

By excellent tone reassured her a little, and while busying myself with her tea and toast I continued to talk in so lively a strain that she was soon won into some degree of cheer.

The hours wore on, the night had set in dark and rainy, but as yet no sign of the absent one. My mother's room adjoined the kitchen, and had long settled to rest, and I had made all necessary arrangements for her comfort through the night. I had the supper table and completed the preparations for the morning meal, when I sat down by the hearth, and gazing into the glowing depths of the open fire, fell into a reverie.

My thoughts were busy with my recent interview with Wilfred Stacy, and the pang I felt as I recalled his parting words was sufficient proof of what I had suspected, that I had in my heart of hearts I loved him well and truly. But he was lost to me for ever, for I knew him too well to hope that he could ever forget, much less forgive, and would allow of my making advances for that purpose. Well, it was through my own fault that I had lost him, and if I suffered for my folly, I could not say I was undeserving of it. I was not one to "wear my heart on my sleeve for daws to peck at." The struggle was a pleasant one to contemplate, so I tried to think of something else.

Suddenly the item of news that I had learned from Mr. Dutton with regard to the escape of the convict, Nat Thorndyck, to his native village, came into my mind, and I felt a sudden chill as I thought of it. What if he should take it into his head to visit the house in my father's absence? It truly terrified me at the idea.

I was very young, scarcely more than thirteen, when he received his sentence, five years before, but I could well remember the bold, ind man who had been the terror of the neighborhood, till his career of crime was checked by his incarceration in the State prison. I thought of the misery to which my mother had allnded, and wished that my father had taken it with him, instead of leaving it home for safe keeping.

It was the proceeds of his last sale of cattle, and he had that morning taken from it the amount necessary for the payment of his rent, which was due on the following day, and which he intended to deposit in the bank of the county town, which was about seven miles distant from our village.

I was constitutionally fearless, and had never before felt the slightest uneasiness when my father was away, and now I was almost angry with myself as I felt these first symptoms of timidity.

"Pshaw!" I exclaimed, impatiently, "I must be growing nervous. If there is any gratitude in human nature, we, at least, are safe from harm at the hands of Nat Thorndyck, for my father was very kind to him at a time when he needed kindness sorely. And if the worst comes to the worst, Bruno, who is growing to be the finest dog of the great, shaggy dog who lay stretched out on the rug at my feet. "I think, old fellow, that you and I could offer a pretty effectual resistance to any attack that might be made upon us."

The brave half raised himself, and gave me a look that said, as plainly as dog-language could express it:

"All right, mistress mine, I am here, and you know well that no harm can reach you while I have life to defend you."

Bruno had been a powerful fellow in his time, a very Goliah of the canine race, able at one spring to bring down a refractory bullock, or to pull a heavily laden cart, if occasion required. But he was superannuated now, and unable to accompany my father in his travels, he remained at home with me. That constituted his sole claim to pensioner. The only active duties that he felt called upon to perform were a vigilant guarding of the premises, and the infusion of my self-made duck or chicken, and a close attendance upon me in all my rambles.

He growled monotonously against the windows, and the wind howled dismally around the corner of the house. I had just risen to replenish the fire, when I was startled by a loud knock at the outer door. Supposing it to be a neighbor, stopping on his return from the village, I took up my lamp to answer the summons, and Bruno started up, with a low growl, and was about to accompany me, but I ordered him to remain, and he unwillingly obeyed. He stood with his head and mane still almost undistiguished my light. I stepped back, shading it with my hand, and then perceived that a stranger stood without the shed. It was a venerable looking old man, apparently quite infirm, for he leaned heavily on his cane, while in a feeble voice he craved permission to enter. I paused irresolute. Our house was literally the home of hospitality—the wayfarer was never turned from its doors. But I had been especially enjoined by my relations to admit a stranger in my father's absence. The old man saw my hesitation, and said, plaintively:

"I am weary, and hungry, and footsore; it is very dark, and if I am forced to go further I shall not reach another house for miles. I am old and in the cold ground, exposed to this chilling rain. Surely Squire Western will not refuse me a night's shelter under his roof."

"You know my father then?" I said, a little surprised.

"I used to know him, and your brother Edward, too."

Ah, that name was a talisman to open both doors and hearts in our house. Edward was in his grave, and his memory was a sacred thing in the family circle. With the wife of Mariner I could not hesitate longer.

"And, fer he names the best one's name,
Se that he list to stay,
He will be ranked in safe refuge be,
A twelvemonth and a day."

I was ashamed of my momentary hesitation; still, I was communicative enough to said:

"Please wait one moment while I speak with my mother."

Going to her room, and finding her awake, I briefly laid the case before her:

"He seems very old and feeble, and is sadly drenched with the storm," I added.

"Admit him," said my mother. "It can surely do no harm. No blessing enters the door that is denied against the wayfarer, and we have only the Apostle's injunction: 'Be not forgetful to entertain strangers, for thereby some have entertained angels unawares.'"

"Well, mama," I said, smiling, "if an angel should go stumping round the country in disguise, I hardly think he is likely to excite so strong a sense of tobacco smoke as this man does. But I will admit him at once. I only hesitated on account of Bruno's growls."

Returning to the door I invited the stranger to enter. But scarcely had he crossed the threshold when Bruno, with a loud, savage howl, sprang, and would have precipitated himself upon the old man but for my prompt interference.

"Down, Bruno! down, sir! Lie down!" I exclaimed in my shrill voice, for I was terrified by the fierceness of my usually gentle dog.

He dared not disobey my peremptory command, but retreated slowly, growling a remonstrance at every step. I apologized to my guest, who had retreated before the dog's attack, for the indescribable reception he had encountered, and drawing an armchair to the fire begged him to be seated. As I drew forward it suddenly struck me that he stooped a good deal and appeared to walk with some difficulty. He sank into the seat, and stretched out his hands, trembling with age and weakness, towards the cheerful blaze. His thin, white hair flowed down over his neck, and his silvery beard descending to his breast gave him a truly patriarchal appearance, but beneath his shaggy eyebrows gleamed a pair of keen grey eyes that age had not yet robbed of their fire. His garments were old and threadbare, and seemed scarcely sufficient to protect him from the inclemency of the weather. I felt sincere compassion for this poor old wayfarer, who seemed so lonely and feeble, and after he was warmed I invited him to sit up to the table and partake of food. While pouring his tea I inquired how far he had travelled.

"Ten miles since morning," he said, naming the place from which he came and telling to what part of the country he was going. But he did not seem inclined to talk much, which I imputed to his weariness. He asked, however, several questions about my father, where he was, when I expected him back, and so forth.

Meanwhile Bruno, who had taken up his station on the hearthrug again, lay with his head drooped on his forepaws and his watchful eye following every motion of the stranger, occasionally showing his white teeth in a subdued snarl. He was never cordial with strangers, but I had seldom seen him manifest so much animosity as he displayed towards the forlorn old man.

"Bruno, old fellow, aren't you ashamed of yourself?" I said, wishing to curb him. "I will bring discredit on the house by your churlish conduct. I thought you had a more charitable disposition."

He answered my remonstrance by rubbing his head fondly against my arm, but continued his watch of the stranger.

After the old man had satisfied his hunger he asked permission to lie down on the lounge and rest himself. I was loth to show him into one room, but to this he objected. He wanted to see my father, on his return, and talk with him about matters of law, he said. So he stretched on the indicated sofa, and I returned to my seat and my netting.

Some time wore on; the storm increased in violence, but I listened vainly in the pauses of the wind to hear my father's cheery voice ring out:

"Hilloa, the house!" as was his custom on his return at night.

Twice in the course of the evening I went into my mother's room, and found her still sleeping sweetly. The last time, impelled by an impulse that I could neither account for nor resist, I ascended to the garret that contained the hay, and taking out the pocketbook put it in the bosom of my dress. My stranger guest seemed sleeping soundly, and even began to sink into a doze, but as for myself I was possessed by an unaccountable restlessness. A vague premonition of evil thwarted me, and I started nervously at every unusual sound. Between nine and ten o'clock I went once more to the outer door, and opening it, looked out into the night. It was pitchy dark, a darkness that might almost be felt, and the storm raged furiously. I glanced in the direction of the road that conducted to my home, and taking out the pocketbook put it in the bosom of my dress. My stranger guest seemed sleeping soundly, and even began to sink into a doze, but as for myself I was possessed by an unaccountable restlessness. A vague premonition of evil thwarted me, and I started nervously at every unusual sound. Between nine and ten o'clock I went once more to the outer door, and opening it, looked out into the night. It was pitchy dark, a darkness that might almost be felt, and the storm raged furiously. I glanced in the direction of the road that conducted to my home, my could I discern to relieve my sense of loneliness; I seemed shut out from all the world, and a sense of utter desolation suddenly came over me. Bruno, who had followed me to the door, seemed to partake of my feelings, for after gazing earnestly into the darkness, and whining into my troubled face, he gave utterance to a long howl that fairly made me shiver.

"Hush, Bruno!" I said, "I think we are both losing our common sense. You master would call us cowards, and not come wide of the mark either."

Closing and bolting the door, I returned to the kitchen, and rousing my guest told him he had better retire, as it was getting late. Then I heaped more wood on the fire, retrimmed my lamp and resolved to watch till midnight. If my father did not arrive by that time, I would go to bed. I would then lie down beside my mother. Throwing a shawl over my shoulders, I sat down near the door of my mother's room, which was ajar, and leaning my head against the cushioned back of the chair, fell into a brown study. Gradually my thoughts grew confused, and before I was aware of being drowsy I had lapsed into the land of dreams. I could not have slept long when I started up with a wide, and a vague sense impending danger, which was not lessened on opening my eyes. Before me stood my stranger guest; but how changed! Erect, decrepitude erect, and stalwart. He had laid one hand on my shoulder; not with the palsied grasp of age, it was the iron hand of a man in the prime of life, while in the power of a hideous nightmare. I strove to speak—to cry out, but my tongue clove to the roof of my mouth. I tried to rise, but my limbs were too weak, too strugging, or it will be worse for you. Attend to what I say. I want the money that your father received for the sale of cattle, the last sum left behind him this morning; also the gold watch which your brother Tom left in your hands when he went away, or as sure as there is a God above me, no sorcerer or hysterics; I have a very decided way of dealing with such things."

I had no intention of indulging in either. By an almost superhuman effort of the will I had succeeded in conquering my terror, and summoning all my self-control, I now felt as cool and calm as ever I did in my life.

"You must be a cowardly fellow," I said, scornfully. "You assume the disguise of a beggar in order to obtain admittance into a house that contains only two defenceless women, and after being warmed and fed you would repay their hospitality by robbing them. Why, any decent villain would be ashamed of such conduct!"

He regarded me for a moment in silence, apparently too much surprised to speak.

"You are a brave girl," he said, at length, "and I admire your spirit. But I cannot stop to parley. I have delayed my purpose until the latest moment, to make sure that no straggler from the village should take the alarm in passing. I must put miles between me and this place before morning. If you will get me the money peaceably, well and good, I will leave without harming you. But if you refuse, and I have to spend precious time in searching for it myself, I will first murder the old woman before your eyes, and then cut your own throat. Now, choose which you will do?"

There was no help for it.

"Take your hand from my arm," I said, "and I will get you the money."

"Not so fast, girl; I shall not loose my hold on you till the money is placed in my hands. I want no devil's trick played on me, and you look as though you were equal to anything of the kind."

"But," I remonstrated, "to get the watch I must go into my mother's room, and I will not have you enter there. She is so feeble that the fright would kill her."

"Oh, we shan't wake her. I'll step like a cat treading on velvet; but where you go, I go too."

Remonstrances were useless. I shrank with loathing from the ruffian's touch, and my blood boiled with indignation at his determination to enter my mother's room.

That even the shadow of wrong or violence should be allowed to approach that dear one, who was the object of constant solicitude in her family, seemed something monstrous and unnatural to me. Setting my teeth hard, to keep down the unavailing expression of my feelings, I rose to lead the way. But the sound of our voices had awakened Bruno. The faithful animal seemed to comprehend at a glance the position of affairs. He saw the hand of the hated stranger laid on the person of his mistress, and, unmindful of his own age and feebleness, with a fierce, vindictive growl, he sprang full at the throat of his enemy. There was a moment's desperate struggle. Scarce knowing what I did, I sprang to the hearth, and seizing the fire-shovel, turned, with the intention, I believe, of dealing the robber a blow with it. But at that instant he shook himself free of the dog, who dropped at my feet and rolled over and over in the death agony. The ruffian's knife had done its work. Another moment, and he had pinioned my arms in his strong grasp, and wrenched the iron from my hand.

"So, girl, you thought to show fight, did you? Had you hit me with that you would never have struck another blow."

I stared at him in astonishment. It was no longer an old man, even in appearance, that stood before me. In his struggle with the dog the patriarchal, false beard had been dragged away, revealing a smoothly shaven chin and a massive lower jaw, strikingly resembling that of a bulldog in formation. His wig, too, had fallen back, displaying a crop of coarse, red hair beneath. Five years had effected so little change in that evil-looking face that I recognised it at once.

"So, Nat Thorndyck, it is you then who have come back to rob your benefactor? Had there been one spark of honor or gratitude in your composition, you would have died rather than have lifted your hand against one of this household."

"You know me, then?" he said, grimly.

"Know you! your face is not one to be easily forgotten."

"Well, the knowledge is like to cost you dear. I would have spared you if I could, for I have not forgotten that your father befriended me once. But that goes for nothing now. You have recognised me, and my own safety requires that I take your life."

"You will not murder me, surely," I said, seeing too late the folly of which I had been guilty.

"I certainly shall do that very thing, and your mother shall keep you company," he said, speaking as coolly as though it were a mere matter of business. "Your evidence would send me to prison once more, and I've had enough of that place to last me a lifetime. I'd sooner commit a dozen murders than risk being sent back."

"But if I promise not to betray you."

"Bah!" he interrupted, contemptuously; "catch me trusting to such a promise. No, dead men tell no tales, and this knife is keen enough to stop even a woman's tongue from blabbing."

A deep groan in the bedroom made us both turn in that direction. My mother had been aroused by the noise of the struggle, and had heard all that followed. She had risen in bed, and her white terror-stricken face looked out from the darkness, ghastly as that of a corpse. How could I comfort her?

"Pray to God, mother," I cried. "Pray to Him! He can help us, even in this strait."

"He'd best be quick about it then," sneered the blasphemous wretch, "for I assure you he's got no time to lose. But get me this money at once, girl, and then I'll settle affairs with you."

"You must be a born simpleton," I answered, contemptuously, "to think that I will give you the money when I know you will take my life as soon as it is in your hands. Find it yourself, if you can, and I wish you joy of the search, for I promise you it will be a long one."

This staggered him, and after a moment's pause, he said, with an appearance of yielding:

"Well, give me the money and the watch, so that I can be off, and I promise not to harm you."

I looked in his face, and was convinced that he would not keep his word. Falsehood was written in every line of it. There was a murderous fire in his eyes, and I knew that the fiend in his heart was thirsting for blood. But my plan was formed on the instant. I affected to believe him, and taking up the lamp, said:

"Come, then."

Still with his grasp on my arm I led him to the opposite side of the room, where a small, movable cupboard stood against the wall. Pushing this a little aside, I slid back a panel of the wall, disclosing a small closet filled with newspapers. From the midst of these I drew forth a pocketbook, and gave it into his hands. Of course it was not the one containing the money, that was safe on my person. This one was filled with old receipts, loose notes and memorandums.

"Well," he remarked, "I should never have thought of looking there for it, that's so. Now, stand still, and mind that you don't move from your tracks while I open it."

To do this he was obliged to relinquish his hold of me. Taking the handle of his knife betwixt his teeth he proceeded to undo the straps of the pocketbook. This was the opportunity on which I had counted. Drawing slowly back by an adroit movement, I suddenly raised my right arm, and, with all the force that I could command, hurled the lamp full in his face. He staggered backward with the blow, and before he could recover himself, I sprang past him with the quickness of thought, gained my mother's room almost at a bound, closed the door, and shot the bolt into its socket.

There were matches and a candle on the table by her bed. I hastily struck a light, then, without pausing, I ran to a large chest that stood in a corner of the room. It was so heavy that on ordinary occasions I could not have moved it. Now I swung it around as easily as though it had been my work-bag, and planted it against the door to serve as a barricade. Then I turned to my mother, who, pale and trembling, had watched my movements in silence.

"Mother, dear mother, if you love me—if you would save your own life—summon up all your courage. We must escape by the window."

She could not speak, but assented by a motion of the head, and tried to assist me as I hurriedly proceeded to invest her with some portion of her clothing.

The robber had been silent for a few moments; probably he had been partially stunned by the force of the blow. Now we heard him venting his rage in a torrent of oaths and blasphemies that fairly chilled my blood. These were accompanied by thundering blows on the door. Had it been of pine it must have yielded, but the heavy maplewood panels and stout hinges stood firm. But I knew it could not hold out long against that fierce assault. I had succeeded in getting my mother partially dressed, speaking words of hope and courage, to which my heart did not respond. She had not risen from her bed without assistance for months, now she got up and walked with a firm step to the window. I threw it wide open. A furious gust of wind and rain drove inward, drenching, blinding and half-suffocating us. My mother would have fallen had I not supported her.

"It is useless," she said, faintly; "my strength is all gone—I can get no farther. Leave me, Milly—save yourself."

"I will be cut into inch pieces before I will leave you, mother," I said, firmly. "Courage, dearest; a little effort will carry us through the window, and then we can secrete ourselves in one of the outhouses."

I placed a chair by the window and almost lifted her into it, designing to help her out first, but she shrank back, saying, in a tone of terror:

"The waterbutt, Milly! We shall be drowned."

Oh, heavens! I had forgotten it. The rain-waterbutt was directly beneath the window and occupied the whole space across. It must be nearly full now, and, in the darkness, how could we escape drowning? I uttered a groan of agony, and stood for a moment motionless. A thousand thoughts flashed through my brain, foremost was that of Wilford Stacy. What would I not have given for the aid of his strong arm, clear brain and fearless heart in that hour of peril! And but for my own folly I might have had it. I was bitterly punished for my sins. "Save, Lord, or we perish!" was the agonizing cry that went up from my heart. Still that heavy shower of blows raining against the door, which bent, and quivered, and threatened every moment to give way; still these horrid oaths, mingled with savage threats of an outrage to which death itself were a mercy. My momentary stupor was over.

"We must risk all," I said. "Better a thousand times to die by drowning than to fall alive into the hands of that wretch."

Seizing a blanket from the bed, I tied one end around my mother's waist, and holding the other in my hand, directed her how to proceed so as to grasp the edge of the waterbutt, and, if possible, swing herself over the side. But while I was yet speaking she uttered a deep groan and fell back into my arms rigid and convulsed. I lowered her gently to the floor, and, leaning from the window, rent the air with my piercing cries for help. I shouted until exhausted, and then sat down by my mother's side, and praying God to strike me dead ere that man could reach me.

Crash! crash! The door was giving way. I rose to my feet and mechanically looked around for some means of defence. There was nothing that would serve as a weapon. The shattered door fell in. The chest served for a moment to impede the robber's entrance, but only for a moment. As he leaped over it I seized a stool, and in sheer desperation hurled it at his head. He darted on one side in time to avoid the blow, and the next moment I was struggling in his arms. With a burst of fierce exultation he drew me through the door into the kitchen. My only hope now was in instant death, that might save me from a worse fate. His hand was within my reach, and, seizing it with my teeth, I bit it until the blood came. The pain seemed to madden him. With a fearful imprecation he clutched my throat, and grasping his knife, which he had thrown on the table, he raised his arm to strike. I saw the uplifted blade gleam in the firelight, and, closing my eyes with a shudder, committed my soul to God. But before the blow could descend I heard the sharp click of a pistol behind me, a bullet whizzed past, and the uplifted arm of the ruffian fell powerless at his side. The next moment his grip on my throat relaxed, and he fell senseless at my feet, prostrated by a blow that might almost have felled an ox.

While faint, dizzy, bewildered, scarce conscious of my deliverance, I reeled forward and fell into the outstretched arms of Wilford Stacy. I did not faint—I never fainted in my life—but I lay in his arms helpless as an infant, with no power to move or speak. My white face and closed eyes frightened him. He thought me dying, and called my name, coupled with words of passionate tenderness that thrilled me even at that moment. A burst of tears came to my relief, and throwing my arms around his neck, I sobbed out:

"Oh, Will, you have saved my life, and if you will only forgive me, I will never, never flirt again, but love you as long as I live."

Reader, his answer is not for your care. The next moment I broke away from him, exclaiming:

"My mother! Oh, Wilford, she is dead or dying. Help me to attend to her."

"Let me first secure this wretch," he said, stooping over the prostrate robber. "He seems quiet enough now, but may revive and do further mischief."

He bound Thorndyck's hands securely, and then came to my assistance. My mother was no longer convulsed, but she lay without sense or motion. Wilford lifted her in his arms and laid her on the bed.

"She lives!" he said, cheerfully, as he laid his finger on her wrist, "and we will soon restore her to consciousness."

He applied proper restoratives, and before long had the pleasure of seeing her open her eyes and look around her. Familiar faces were bending over her, and at first she seemed to retain no consciousness of what had reduced her to such a state. But as memory returned she started up in bed, trembling in every limb. We soothed her with assurances of safety, and while we were still trying to allay her fears there came a loud rapping at the outer door, and my father's voice demanded admittance. Wilford hastened to open the door.

"What, Stacy! You here? Did my little girl get lonesome in my absence, and invite you to keep her company?" said my father in his pleasant, cheery tones.

But as he crossed the threshold he paused and gazed appalled at the ghastly spectacle that met his eyes. There lay his faithful dog in a pool of blood, and near him the apparently lifeless form of the robber. The floor was strewn with fragments of the broken lamp, and mingled with them lay Wilford's pistol and Thorndyck's bloody knife. Farther on was the battered and broken door that led into his wife's room.

"My wife! my child!" he gasped, in a tone of agony, as he sprang forward.

"Both safe, thank God!" said Wilford.

The next moment my father, with one arm clasped tightly around my waist, was bending over to kiss my mother and assure himself that she was indeed uninjured.

Then came explanations on all sides. I had to relate all the events of the evening, interrupted occasionally by the vehement exclamations of my auditors. Then Wilford took up the tale, and we learned the cause of his providential arrival at the moment of my greatest extremity. After returning home that evening he went up to his room and sat trying to read, but really thinking over his interview with me, and, as he afterwards acknowledged, blaming himself for the precipitancy with which he had acted. Nor could he quite divest himself of a feeling of anxiety as he thought of the possibility of my remaining alone in the house all night, in case my father should fail to return. About ten o'clock a younger brother came up to bed, and casually mentioned the fact of Nat Thorndyck's return to his home, and added a report that he had been seen lurking in the vicinity of Squire Western's house the day before. Wilford was on his feet in an instant, and without stopping to reply to his brother's exclamation of astonishment, he seized his revolver and sallied forth into the rain and darkness, determined to assure himself of my safety by keeping guard at our door until my father's return. He was still at at some distance from the house when the sound of my cries reached him; they added wings to his feet. When he reached the house he found the door bolted, but there was a window in the porch that was unfastened, and by this he gained admittance. He entered the kitchen just as the door of my mother's room gave way beneath the blows showered upon it by Thorndyck, who, deafened by his own noise, heard not the sound of approaching footsteps. Wilford took in the whole scene at a glance, and when he saw me in the robber's grasp he raised his pistol to fire. Twice he took deliberate aim and twice paused, fearing that the bullet intended for the assassin might reach my heart. But when he saw Thorndyck's arm uplifted for the fatal blow he hesitated no longer. Dropping his pistol as soon as he had discharged it, he seized a stick of wood and inflicted the blow that laid the ruffian at my feet.

"And for the sake of that paltry sum the wretch would have committed murder! I would the money had been given to the flames ere it had subjected my loved ones to such danger," said my father, as he drew me close to him.

"Nevertheless it is safe, father," I said, drawing forth the pocketbook and placing it in his hands.

"It is yours, my child, every cent of it. You have dearly earned it, and it shall serve for your wedding-dowry, provided you marry your preserver."

Wilford smiled and I turned away my head.

"And now," said my father, "we must attend to this wretch, who has done his best to render my home desolate in return for the benefits I once heaped upon him. I think I could have forgiven any other man more readily."

"The more merit, then, in forgiving him, father. We must not let his guilt make us forget our Christianity."

Upon examination, it was found that the robber's right arm was shattered, and there was a serious but not fatal wound on his head. When restored to consciousness by the application of proper remedies, he glowered savagely upon us all, but refused to speak, and bore his sufferings in sullen silence.

He was removed to another room, and my father, who had considerable skill in surgery, dressed his wounds. In the morning a surgeon was summoned to attend him. What more remains to be written of this bad man I will relate in a few words. He remained with us until his wounds were so far healed as to render it safe to remove him to the county jail, there to await his trial at the next term of the Supreme Court. While beneath our roof, although the object of the most unremitting kindness from every member of the family, he never manifested the slightest symptom of repentance, but retained his dogged sullenness of demeanor to the last, seeming only to regret that he had failed in accomplishing his nefarious purpose. Of course his trial resulted in his being sent to his old quarters in the State Prison, and this time his sentence was for life.

Poor Bruno! Dear, gallant fellow, faithful unto death! Some may curl the lip at the idea of shedding tears at the loss of a dog, but I am not ashamed to confess that I wept bitterly over the body of the noble brute who had given his life in defence of mine.

I have read of those whose hair, through grief or mortal terror, has grown white in a single night; my curls retained their sheeny darkness undimmed, but my face, in its almost deathly pallor, bore evident traces of what I had undergone, and it was weeks before it regained its usual rosy bloom. Strange to say, my mother was not permanently injured by the events of that fearful night. The excitement through which she had passed seemed to act as a tonic to her debilitated system, she began to grow better at once, and in a few months was completely restored to health.

And did I marry my preserver? Of course I did. And if you wish for any further particulars of this veracious history, you can have them by addressing Mrs. Wilford Stacy, P——, State of M——. And did I keep my promise about flirting? Most faithfully. If you doubt it, ask my husband.

GRAND MASQUERADE FESTIVAL OF THE LIEDERKRANZ.

Last week we gave a complete account and illustration of the Arion Fancy Ball, which seemed to cap the very climax of festive success and gaiety. If we had any new terms of appreciation left, we would try to intimate that the carnival of the Liederkranz, on the 17th, was as true a success in a different line, and that without even suggesting the various original devices and masks of the Arion, it was fully as ingenious in an entirely new series of grotesque contrivances.

The Liederkranz (or "Wreath of Songs") is an older organization than the Arion, dating in this city as far back as 1847, and consequently can claim the very respectable age of 18 years, as well as the greater honor of sending into the world the gay Arion, a splendid "chip of the old block," or, more properly speaking, a huge limb of the parental trunk.

It started with an organization of 15 or 20 gentlemen, and has kept on increasing in numbers until now it has a roll of members more than 800 strong, among whom are many of the most respectable German residents of the city. In 1860 it was chartered by the Legislature, and two or three years ago the society was able to build a fine club house at Nos. 31 and 33 Fourth street.

The present board of officers are Charles Lellmann, President; Max Goep and L. Kammerer, Vice-Presidents; George Nembach and W. Rasmus, Secretaries; L. A. Grasse, Treasurer; Director, A. Paur.

The ball of Thursday night presented a vast and brilliant spectacle of constantly changing color and movement, under the blaze of gas and among the perfumes of flowers. The decorations of the hall were lavish and in rich taste, giving the appearance of a grand carnival scene. The second and third tiers were festooned with entirely new draperies in carnival colors, surrounding a number of amusing oil paintings, representing a variety of subjects, well calculated to excite the merriment of the spectator. In one place the spectator beheld a painting of "Punch and Judy" teaching two cockroaches to dance. In another appeared the bust of a well-known actress, with little imps playing sad frolics with her cranium. In another an astronomer was seen taking observations through a glass, before which stands a clown intercepting the view.

The stage was so arranged as to present the view of a magnificent tent, with a beautiful garden scene on the rear wall, in front of which was the name "Liederkranz," in letters of fire, and the representation of a harp, formed of hundreds of gas lights ingeniously arranged. Besides the flood of light thus concentrated on the stage, six large chandeliers, festooned with baskets of artificial flowers, illuminated the vast tent, and added to the brilliancy of the grand scene.

The strange features of the night were many, too numerous in fact to admit of description. But we may glance at a few of the more prominent novelties that were introduced. First of all came the Grand Procession of Prince Carnival, which made its appearance about 11 o'clock, emerging from behind the tent at the back of the stage, and making two or three circuits of the floor in the following order:

1. A drum-major 10 feet high, with cocked hat and Roman nose.
2. Fifteen pantaloons, in white and spangled dresses.
3. The Saucepan Brigade, composed of 15 kitchen Amazons, with pots, kettles and pans on their heads, and brooms, knives, forks, &c., in their hands.
4. A huge fork, piercing a mammoth Bologna sausage.
5. Prince Carnival in his grand chariot.
6. Newspaperdom, represented by the Herald, Tribune, Times, World, Staats Zeitung, Sun and other journals.

Our Artist has been so explicit in illustrating these capital jokes upon the newspapers that description is superfluous; the cut will bear study.

The Schnantz quadrille, or card quadrille, was another feature worthy of mention. Sixteen men, dressed as cards, danced a regular quadrille, and occasioned much merriment.

Early in the morning a series of acrobatic feats were performed, and about five o'clock the dancers separated and the ball dissolved.

OUR MAY.

BY JENNIE K. GRIFFITH.

We rename her Juney, for our Mays are chill,
And the roses, May roses we say,
Are only May buds that won't blossom until Kissed out by June's sweeter day.

No matter for names, for the lush June skies
Have no softer or sunnier hue,
Than the tender light prisoned in May's blue eyes,
Making summer our whole year through.

And no matter for roses, the touch of her hand
Falls soft as their pink petals may,
And her fragrant breath sweet is, as summer's breath bland,
With red clover blossoms and hay.

The notes of glad birds carol out in her glee,
And the sharp chirp of dear little things
That live you can't guess if in air or in tree,
A voice with impalpable wings.

Oh! baby, all ways that are your ways charm,
All wilfulness pretty you do,
In the hollow of God's hand kept from harm,
He loves our wee darling too.

THE PAYMASTER'S STORY.

I HAD been commissioned a paymaster in the army.

It was a small step towards the great end, but I accepted the position thankfully. The wealth, which I now for the first time in my life really coveted, would be in my possession, even though it was not mine, and perhaps the world, which always will bow to the god, no matter in whose hands or how obtained, would show me some way by which some of the thousands passing through my charge would become my own honestly; for though I had heard much of paymasters and quartermasters growing rich upon the legal robberies of our soldiers, I had not reached that point in my greed for gold that I could consent to make it in that way.

I was haunted by this great desire; for had not the fiat gone forth that I was too poor to be the husband of her whom of all the world I loved best. Then it was that for the first time in my life the thirst came upon me to become rich. It was no consolation to me that Josephine bade me be of good cheer and strive. It was no comfort that she assured me that we could wait, and that if our love was of the pure metal it would not lose its weight or worth by lying still for years. Philosophy was no friend to me, and the struggle was sore in despite of all its teachings.

In a few words I can explain my meaning. Josephine, she whom I loved so dearly, and who so dearly loved me, was an orphan, under the charge of an aunt, the stern executor of the instructions of her nephew, the brother of Josephine, who by the will of her father was left sole trustee of her fortune, a large one, but tied with this uncontrollable trusteeship.

This brother I had never seen, and knew nothing of him, but such description as could be given by his sister from a memory dating five years back, at which time Jarvis Witherstone, who was twenty years the senior of Josephine, had gone for the tour of Europe, a tour so prolonged that he still remained by turns in different cities of the Mediterranean.

It was this brother who had lain down this inexorable programme of wealth. Upon it I thought in the day, and dreamed at night. Of those few who have really loved, I would ask: is there wonder I should build up schemes; that I should plot and plan; that I should lose the present and see only the future; that I should justify the end in the means?

I, who handled and possessed hundreds of thousands, while I could only call the miserable pittance of a couple of hundred per month my own, saw countless thousands within my grasp, honestly mine, could I but use that which was entrusted to me to obtain it. I who loved so much, with a price set upon the object of my love, and that price within my very reach, should I refuse to grasp it?

"Let him who is without sin cast the first stone." I saw about me those who had known poverty from birth grow suddenly rich! I heard whispers of contracts, of speculation, of the rise and fall of stock, of brilliant schemes, and of wonderful wealth, gained within a day, and I rushed blindly on into the grand gulf that awaited me.

What wonder that I fell! There is more drunkenness than that arising from liquor. There is the drunkenness of success, wild and exhilarant, and the drunkenness of failure, fierce and desponding; both of these I knew in every phase.

One night I had played very high. Thousand after thousand went from me over the faro table. The wines were grand, and I drank. The lights were brilliant, the carpets were soft, the banker was courteous, but the cards were bad. It was the old story, with no variation save one, and that one a variation that, had I been questioned of it at the time, I would have ignored and laughed at, as a mere irritation caused by my losses, or by the disturbed state of my brain from what I had drunk. It was this.

Opposite me, at the table, stood a small, light-built man, whose age, as near as I could guess it, was about forty. His dress was quaint, something that showed him to be no servile follower of fashion, and yet compensating by its taste and richness for any departure from established rules. There was something in this man's face that would have attracted, perhaps painfully, at any time. His features were sharp and well cut, his teeth were perfect and white, and his eye, a dark hazel, had that snap and yet power of steady gaze not often found together. Added to all this a great profusion of very dark hair hung down upon his coat collar, and straggled in small irregular curls over his forehead, from which, as a large stake would be swept away from the table, he would throw them with a toss, that had in it a volume of exclamation.

There was something about the man especially unpleasant to me. His gaze and attention interfered with my playing and drew upon me the notice of those in the room. I could not make a movement that his eyes did not follow me; even when I sought diversion by swallowing goblets of wine from the sideboard, a movement of his lips seemed to signify that in imagination he was drinking with me.

At last I was annoyed beyond bearing. I could scarcely follow the play for watching this strange man, and I lost fearfully. In another moment I should have spoken to him had he not at the very instant reversed the matter by speaking to me. He said, as I placed a large amount upon the table:

"Ah, you are wrong. This is the card you should have covered."

I was about to burst into an angry exclamation, when I was silenced by a glance at the card the dealer had that instant turned. It was the identical card that would have made me whole on the losses of the evening had I covered the one designated by the stranger. A cold shudder ran over me, half at the strange guess, for guess it only could be, and half at my madness in not instantly changing my stake on the suggestion of the stranger. The banker looked grimly at him as he swept my money away. Once more I placed a large amount upon the table. "Let me entreat you to change your play to one of these three cards!" said the stranger, without raising his eyes from my stake.

"Permit me to ask," I said, fiercely, "whether it is you or I that is playing? If it is you, I will instantly take my departure. If it is I, courtesy should teach you to do the same."

I thought his eyes flashed and snapped with an ill-concealed rage as he bowed stiffly and said:

"Pardon me, sir. I have allowed myself, in the excitement of the play, to forget that I should not have become interested," and he turned away from the table and walked to the upper end of the rooms.

The dealer had been going on like a machine, with the game, during this episode, but as the stranger went away, and the very card he had advised me to cover turned up, there was a visible start and stare of the cold-blooded card handler, that convinced me he was not so perfectly machine-like that he had not been an attentive listener to every word that passed.

Now I was completely unsettled; I stood at the table staring helplessly from the dealer to the stranger, who was with his back towards us, watching the play that was proceeding at another table. That night I could play no more. The man had destroyed my faith in chance, he had spoken infallibly, reading the cards as I would read a paragraph, and yet he did not play. He must be the devil!

As I passed through the hall, on my way out, I saw the stranger come from the main room and make his way towards the stairs, with a gesture to myself as though he would stop me and speak; I was in no mood for this, and with a quick step I sprang into an omnibus that was passing, from the windows of which I saw my would-be friend gazing each way upon the street, as though in search of me. It was an hour before I could sufficiently calm the irritation of this adventure to permit me, after I had reached my rooms, to read. That night my fortune had been particularly bad. Thousand after thousand had gone, but still I should not have left the spot of terrible fascination until every dollar I had carried there was lost, only for this strange interruption of him who had sought to instruct my play.

At last I had composed myself over my supper, and, with the removal of the cloth, was counting up, mentally, all my experiences of the past few days. I had played heavily, and each time been heavily the loser. I had been also in Wall street, and in my pocket held evidence of scores of thousands risked upon the turn of a stock, as I had risked upon the turn of a card. Some change must come soon, or the remaining thousands would melt like snow before the sun, and I should be lost without hope. Even in my villainies I had had not forgotten those business habits in which I was educated, but had kept a faithful record of every item, and a concise account of each dollar that had passed from my hands over the gambling table or at the stock board. It would serve, I thought bitterly, as a guide to those who would be interested in my crime, when, after the last turn of the wrench had come, I sent myself suddenly out of the world by my own hand. And then, as I thought, I slipped my hand towards the inside pocket, where rested the case that contained not only my record, but all my secret and private letters and my money.

It was a terrible shock, that sliding of my hand into the pocket. It was not there. Gone! Dropped, most likely, in the gambling-house, among those desperate men, who would use the information they would find there for my ruin unless they were heavily bribed. And there, too, were Josephine's letters, the few she had sent me, breathing the pure passion of her nature. Oh, that another eye should see those precious lines, see them, perhaps, but to laugh or make them a jibe among his associates. The money! Pshaw! what was the loss of a few paltry thousands to the loss of such letters and documents. For an instant I was paralysed, but only for an instant, and I sprang to my feet, mad with excitement, and gave the bell a continued ring. At the moment of my act the door of the room opened, and a servant, staring in a broad fright, ushered in, without a word, the identical stranger who had offered his advice at the faro-table. Something there was said, as the man stepped into the room, but my ears were deaf to everything at that instant but the whirring of my own brain, and yet his appearance checked my hand upon the bell-rope, and transfixed me for the minute with astonishment. What did he want?

"You will excuse my intrusion. Are you Mr. ——?"

I was annoyed at the man's coming, and scarcely summoned enough politeness for the single word "yes."

"It is necessary for me to be exact in my asking. My business with you is of importance, and I must make sure that I do not address the wrong person. Is your name Major George ——, Paymaster in the U. S. Army?"

Was the man a detective that had been set to watch me, and at last arrest me at a moment when I could not save myself? The blood chilled in my veins, and it was only with difficulty that I could gasp out from my parched throat an answer that I was the one of whom he inquired.

"My business is of a private nature," he continued, dismissing the frightened and inquisitive servant with a wave of the hand, and examining the door after his exit to see that it was closed. "Pray be seated."

I stood still. There was a suavity about the man that I would have resented, but for the cowardice of my conscience. Once more he pointed to a seat with an air of authority, and I dropped guiltily into it, like a criminal about to hear his sentence.

"You are acquainted with, and love, I believe, Miss Josephine Witherstone. Is it not so?"

Heavens! how quick I was upon my feet. Must I submit, even though this man was an instrument of the law, in whose clutches I was so soon to be, to hear her name upon his lips in questions that could have nothing to do with his duty? No! I would brave the worst at once.

"How dare you come to me, sir, with such questions? By what right do you assume to question me at all?" was my fierce response.

"By the very best right in the world, my dear sir. Sit down again, and in good time you shall hear all I have to say."

"Ask me no questions, sir," I answered, "but do your duty. The questioning will be done by another than yourself."

I fancied that for a moment I had checked the man, for a strange expression came upon his face, but vanished again immediately.

"You will find it necessary, major, to answer my questions, no matter by whom you may be questioned hereafter. It is my right, and until by your own action you withdraw that right I shall use it."

"By your own action!" What did the man mean? "Withdraw that right!" Was he to be bought off, and intended this as a hint. With such fellows, delicacy, I thought, is a poor material to deal in. Therefore, I would speak plainly.

"Why do you not at once enter upon your business?" I said. "You are, without doubt, aware of everything, and have a duty to perform, or intend to waive its performance on certain considerations! If the first, sir, perform it once, and ask no questions; I am ready to go with you instantly. If the last, speak boldly, and name your price. I am in your power, and if the sum is within mine, I will comply."

The man looked puzzled, I thought. He had, no doubt, been unaccustomed to such plain speakers in the line of his profession, and was taken aback. He did not not wear the expression long, but returned to the attack, with, as I fancied, a slight smile upon his face.

"I cannot attempt to follow you. Major, your line of defence is certainly too deep for me. I seek only from you an answer to a few questions upon points of which I feel it necessary to become informed. I would do you service, and ask from you no reward. You have been playing heavily and have lost, to this time, over sixty thousand dollars. Sixty-three thousand, I believe."

"You understand your business, and have watched me to good purpose!" I said, the moment he paused.

He raised his eyes for a moment, as though in inquiry, and then went on:

"Now then, I would ask you plainly, major, what is to be the end of this? Can you believe that there is anything short of utter ruin in it? Do you think it calculated to win her whom you so profess to love? Sit down, sir! sit down! I have much more to say. You said something a moment ago about my watching you. Do not labor, sir, under this delusion. I have not watched you, nor did I ever, to my knowledge, see you before this evening."

"What!" I said, starting once more to my feet, "are you then not a detective, placed upon my track to ferret out all this of which you have been talking?"

A grim smile passed over his features as he uttered the single word "Nonsense."

"In heaven's name, then, what are you," I shouted, "and what do you want of me that you intrude yourself upon me, not only in public, but thrust yourself into my presence and into my affairs in private."

The man was imperturbably calm, and his voice as even when he answered, as though speaking on any ordinary topic:

"I have told you, sir, that I came here to serve you."

"I want none of your service, sir!" I said fiercely; "you will oblige me by leaving my room at once; your intrusion came at a most unseasonable moment."

The words had scarce passed from my mouth when the idea flashed across me, "Who is this man, and how has he become knowing to these matters of which he speaks?" As the thought came to me, I raised my eyes and met those of my visitor. In them there was something that sent a shudder through me, something that told me that my very secret mind was read by him as legibly as a book. I was not superstitious, but this man inspired me with a certain awe, founded, perhaps, on the strange circumstances that occurred at the gambling table.

"Your bursts of passion, sir," he went on, "can have no effect upon me. You spoke of my performing my duty. I have indeed a duty to perform, and I will perform it. That duty is to serve you and save you, if possible, unless you choose to run blindfold into the gulf that gapes for you."

I sat silent and listened.

"Do you remember fifteen years ago when you stood at the bedside of your dying father, the injunction he gave you to walk uprightly through life, that you might finally die as he did, having no shame for any act to cloud his passage to another world?"

I gazed long and earnestly at the face before me, to read, if I could, any memory that would connect it with the past, but there was no response.

"Do you remember the sister, she who loved you so dearly, and who died in another land? Do you remember the last letter she wrote, saying that her spirit would be with you in death, as it had been in life, and calling upon you so to act that all men should be proud to speak of you?"

I shrank under the words of this mysterious man, and hid my face in shame at the memory he brought back to me.

"And how, sir, have you followed these injunctions? Is it by stealing—ah, you need not start so fiercely—stealing is the word—sixty-three thousand dollars of the moneys intrusted to your keeping by your country at the moment of her peril? Is it by rushing madly into crime that can only end in shame and death, that you would bring about that time when men shall be proud to speak of you?"

His words burnt into my heart like searing irons, and his cold, proud eye froze mine as they would have struggled to my tongue.

"Will it bring honor to the love you have so professed for that fair girl who has clung to you against the wish of her relatives, and who has so bade you hope?"

Once more I strove to look into the eyes that were fixed upon me and answer, but the words would not come. He went on:

"You need not speak, I know what you would say, that it was this love that led you into the course you have taken, that you might win the wealth that would give you Josephine Witherstone for a wife. The plea is as false as it is weak. What enjoyment or prosperity could have come from the wealth so won?"

I shrank under the gaze of this man, who was reading my sealed heart as an open book. I dared not look at him; I felt sure there must be something more than human in the knowledge he possessed of my life and of my thought.

"I have said, sir, that I came here to serve you, not to upbraid. You are at this moment a defaulter to the government in sixty-three thousand dollars, and heaven and yourself only knows how much more. What means have you of paying this enormous sum?"

"None!" came up from my burning throat in a tone that startled even myself.

"None!" he repeated.

"No means," I said, "but to continue in the same course, until all is regained, or all is lost."

There was a long silence, and then he spoke again:

"If you had aid in making good this loss, what surety is there that the same thing would not occur again?"

"There is no such aid," I answered.

Once more he repeated the words precisely as before.

"I can give no surety."

"Sixty-three thousand dollars is a great sum, sir, to risk upon a man who has no faith in his power to keep away from the gambling table!"

"I ask no one to risk this sum upon me," I said, coming once more to my feet. "I am past all service but my own." And then, as the remembrance rushed upon me that I had not even sought the name of this man who had inspired me with such terror, nor yet by a single question undertaken to find the source from whence he had derived his information of me, I turned upon him, and with an effort to summon some haughtiness of manner, and to look into his face, I went on: "You cannot serve me, sir, and even if you could I see no reason that I should accept service from one who is an utter stranger to me."

"My name," he said, thoughtfully, "would be of little service to you now, even if you knew it. When I first entered this room you gave me no chance to announce my name or business, now the announcement would be useless, unless I have it in my power to serve you, then it will be time enough."

"And you propose to serve me by ——"

"Exactly—by loaning you the sum of sixty-three thousand dollars."

I stared at him in astonishment. What millionaire must he be who could talk as coolly of lending three-score of thousands as though he were simply about to buy some gewgaw for a child. There was no doubting the sanity of the speaker, he had given, within the few hours past, proofs of it beyond doubt. That he based all he said upon what seemed to me more than human information was the weight that bore down every effort of my own to set his interference at defiance. I spoke again:

"Upon what security?"

"Upon the word of a man of honor; one who will neither frequent the gambling table, nor use the money that does not belong to him, to acquire a wealth that he cannot enjoy while he has a memory of how it was gained. Do you know any such?"

I stood silent for a few moments, and then looking full at my interrogator, I said:

"You, who seem to know so much of me that I can really tell you nothing, should know that, even were I restored to that position you propose, with it would come the same agony from which I sought to break away. There is a price set upon her I love, a price set upon my earthly happiness! Must I sleep while I have the most remote chance to win the gold that will buy her?"

"No! but you have mistaken your course. At the gaming table you have not the most remote chance. With my aid you may win a few thousands, but I should, after a few turns of the cards, awaken to the folly of which I was guilty to-night and fall back upon that old reserve to which I have so often sworn fealty."

I thought of the wonderful advice he had given me over the faro table, and again a tumult of theories ran through my brain, tending to the identification of this mysterious man before me.

"And what must I do to obtain that wealth by which only I can buy happiness?" I said, in a burst of passion.

"Wait!" said the stranger, stepping towards me and taking the hand I had stretched forth in the impetuosity of my manner. "Wait, and work. Show me that you are a man, show me that you are beyond temptation, and I promise you my aid, not only in repairing your losses, but in winning Josephine. Within one year, if I am convinced of the truth of your course, not only fortune but she shall be yours."

There was something in the earnestness of these words that sent a thrill of belief through me, and I returned the pressure upon the hand that held mine.

"Is it a bargain?" he asked.

"It is a bargain."

At this moment there came a knock at the door and a servant entered with two letters which he laid upon the table. I thought as I took them in my hand and glanced towards the stranger that a curious glisten came into his eyes, and before I could speak the words asking his indulgence for a moment while I read the contents he said:

"Don't mind me, look into your missives. You will find them especially interesting. The one is from the charming Josephine, asking your attendance at her house to-morrow on a little matter that will wipe away from your heart the shadow that now hovers about it, and the other a notification from your brokers in Wall street that your little venture in Erie has turned out well, so well, in fact, that it will be hardly necessary for me to make good the losses you have suffered over the gaming-table."

Even while he was speaking I was devouring the contents of the little waterlined pink note in my hand, and finding it all be said, and with a blank stare of astonishment at him as I broke open the second, I rushed eagerly to the announcement that my stock, which I had backed for a rise, had gone up that day so rapidly, that if I chose to sell it the next morning, at the opening of the board, I would have margin enough to make good all my losses, and place me once more where I had stood a fortnight before. I was speechless with surprise. If I had thought this man before gifted with supernatural powers, now I was sure of it. Not only did he read the cards and foretell their winning, but he spoke with familiarity of those things in the past which were only known to myself and to my sister, who was now with the dead. Not only did he look into my heart and read there my most secret thought, but even through sealed envelopes, deciphering hidden writing. I could contain myself no longer, but burst forth with:

"In the name of heaven, are you man or devil?"

"Certainly not an ill-disposed devil," he answered, with a smile.

"Then," I said, half-jokingly, half in earnest, "there is but one thing more necessary for you to do to convince me that you are superhuman, and that is to produce the pocketbook I lost this evening, or tell me where I shall find it."

"Nothing easier," was his answer, with his smile almost breaking into a laugh, "providing you describe the lost property."

"A gray russet leather case, with an elastic band, containing about sixteen thousand dollars in United States notes, several letters and documents, of no use to any one but the owner. The finder to be liberally rewarded. See advertisement in New York Herald to-morrow."

"Presto! Come! Your pocketbook and contents lie here before you, major. Count the cash, and see that it is all right, as I am not accustomed to handle so much value belonging to other people."

I sprang quickly towards him, and caught both his hands in mine.

"Who are you?" I cried, with a fierce earnestness which I think for the instant frightened the smile from his face. "Answer me!"

"Jarvis Witherstone."

For a moment I staggered back, in the next I held him in my arms, and was assured the embrace was returned.

"And now," he said, as we were once more seated, "I can't reconcile it to myself to leave you to-night, after this our first meeting, without clearing myself from the false character you have chosen to put upon me. I am neither devil or magician, superhuman, nor spirit medium. All that I have said and done has come about by simple means. I arrived at home last night, brought here by this very love affair of yours. During to-day it has been settled to the mutual satisfaction of myself and Josephine, and I trust to yours. This evening I left my house to find an old friend, and was told to my sorrow that he was a frequenter of the house where I met you. There I went, and while waiting his coming became interested in your play. I never handle the cards myself, nor yet allow myself to advise, though I have found that, by close observation and calculation, I can sometimes make near guesses, such as I made this evening. As I was leaving the house I picked up your pocketbook. I knew it as yours, because I had seen you take it out in the room, but when I sought you in the street you had disappeared, and none of those with whom you had been playing could tell me who you were. Under these circumstances I could only go to the letters and documents in the book to find out. Then I was astounded to identify you with the gambler who had lost so heavily, and felt it a duty at once to come to you, and either save you or break off all engagement between yourself and my sister. When I entered the room you gave me no opportunity to produce the pocketbook and declare my business. You wonder further at my knowledge of what has passed between yourself, your father and sister. Your father, when I was a boy, was my friend and protector; when by accident I met your sister abroad I loved her, and but for her death she would have been my wife. Is there any wonder that I should have asked from her the minutest questions of your father's death, or that I should not have known at the time of her decease each thing she did? It was this love which, when I had identified you as the seeker of my sister's hand, brought me home to consummate your wishes. Do you wonder further at my reading of the sealed letters? The one from Josephine I saw written before I left home; the other, by a shrewd guess, I arrived at simply because my old schoolfellow, Nathan Burgess, who is your broker, and who has the investment of Josephine's money, expressed to-day some astonishment at my declaration that you were penniless, and declared that within a few days you had made a heavy operation through him in Erie stock, which would turn out well. There you have the whole story of my superhuman power. Whatever there is beyond comes only from my ability to read men, an ability I have tried to cultivate."

My story is told. The year has gone by of my probation, and I feel sure that in the long future I shall acquit myself of the promise I made to Jarvis Witherstone, my wife's brother.

"November 30.—More blanks in my journal. I said we were growing alarmingly intimate; such an intimacy is alarming to a fellow who came to Coltonslough bent on devoting himself to Aristotle and Aristophanes, Æschylus and Euripides, and all that short of people. Have been reading 'The Clouds' all this morning, but found a strange undercurrent of. Susan Turner pervading that classic satire; and I mean to go in and win this time; those fellows at St. Boniface sha'n't be able to laugh at my discomfiture a second time. Why were women created for the trouble and confusion of the superior sex? I thought I should be so safe at Coltonslough, remote from Rosa, the Delilah of my youth; and lo! here is another Delilah a thousand times more dangerous, a shy, brown-eyed Omphale, for whose sake any intellectual Hercules on this earth would meekly hold the distaff. She is so pretty; and all those modest, shrinking ways have such an unspeakable fascination after a long course of Rosa's sharp repartees, all redolent of the bar and the beer-engines. I can never dissociate Rosa from the smell of malt-liquors and ardent spirits, with just a faint suspicion of lemons and stale porkpie. But there must be something extraordinary about this girl, for her vulgar surroundings do not seem to vulgarize her. I don't mean that she is one of nature's duchesses, or any humbug of that sort. I have no belief in nature's nobility, and to my mind a duchess is a person who has been cradled in Belgravia, whose long clothes were flounced with point d'Alençon, and to whom the wrong side of Temple Bar would be as strange as the centre of Africa. I should by no means care to see my little Susie in a London drawing-room; but I can fancy her domiciled in some rustic cottage in the lake district, a patient Wordsworthian little maiden, waiting upon and worshipping her husband, and getting him cosy breakfasts, with silvery trout broiled to perfection, and mushrooms newly gathered from the neighboring plains. If I were only an embryo curate, with neither expectations nor ambitious desires, I scarcely think that I could find a better wife than this simple gazelle-eyed maiden; but——Oh, that terrible monosyllable! The history of all the world seems made up of buts and ifs.

"My afternoon stroll upon the esplanade has grown into an established thing. Sixpence judiciously bestowed upon the children dispatches those young abominations scurrying over the waste ground to an emporium which they call 'the shop,' whence they return after an interval, embrowned and sticky with the traces of gingerbread and barley-sugar. In the meanwhile, Susan and I are alone on that dreary esplanade. What is it Byron says about youth, and solitude, and the sea? Well, that sort of thing is rather a dangerous combination, and I begin to think that if I want to redeem my character at St. B., I shall be obliged to take myself and my books away from Colstonslough. 'Breathes there the wretch with soul so dead,' who could sit in that dingy parlor, coaching himself in the classics, while one of the prettiest girls in all the British dominions is walking up and down the esplanade, opposite his window, and thinking of him? Yes, she thinks of me, and expects me when that yellow streak begins to glimmer in the west. I have seen her head turned towards my window, and then I pitch my friend Sophocles into the remotest corner, and go out for my afternoon stroll.

"December 10.—Yes; the dismal confession must be written, or the account between R. L. and self closed for ever. I am in love—seriously, desperately, unreasonably in love—with a young person whose social status is something between a parlor-maid and a nursery-governess. Could she be worse off than she is now? Could any turn in the wheel of fortune leave her in a lower place than that she now occupies? Scarcely! I don't believe in those dismal histories which the Minerva press was wont to disseminate. Susan is just the sort of girl to fall on her feet. Those shy, sensitive creatures always know how to take care of themselves, and often do remarkably well in life. It's your dashing, high-spirited, strong-minded girl who goes to the bad. Goodness knows I'm not a bad-hearted fellow. I can't look at such a girl as Susan without worrying myself about her future career. There's scarcely any sacrifice I wouldn't make—short of the sacrifice of my own prospects—in order to insure her welfare. Yes, the little stranger, let into my dwelling unawares, has strung his bow and twanged his arrow home to my heart. I am really in love this time. I used to feel savage with those St. B. fellows when they talked nonsense to Rosa; but I think I should annihilate the man who so much as looked at this girl. Yes; I am prepared to make any sacrifice—short of the destruction of my own prospects. Your really rich man or your penniless beggar can afford to make a fool of himself; but I stand just in that middle distance between the golden lands of plenty and the sterile plains of poverty, in which a man must needs be peculiarly circumspect.

"17*th*.—I have broken the ice at last. What a little Puritan she is! And yet I know that she loves me, with the regular Haydée or Zuleika sort of devotion; would like to kneel at my feet and offer me tiresome flowers when I was absorbed in the classic fogies, and all that sort of thing. A long interview on the esplanade this afternoon. I beat the ground with the greatest discretion, for it would have been the easiest thing in the world to frighten her. It must be a marriage—a bonâ fide marriage—secret, of course. She won't object to that. But upon the other point I can see she would be inflexible. Those quiet people are always obstinate. Ay di me, my pretty Susie, I fear that you and I must say good-bye. And I am really over head and ears in that dismal pit. I am most absurdly fond of her; that's the worst of it. Yes, we must say good-bye. The catechisms in the rector's parlor and the Sunday school have done their work, and Susan Turner will be a drudge all her life rather than surrender those ridiculous prejudices which it is the fashion to implant in the minds of rustic youth. Addio, my pretty Susan. I cannot imagine anything more delightful than our quiet walks in the cold gray twilight; I cannot conceive any eyes—out of a Murillo—so beautiful as those brown orbs of yours—orbs is the proper phrase, I think, where a fellow is sentimental; but the price demanded is too heavy. One may buy gold in too dear a market; and ten years hence, with blighted prospects and half a dozen children, I might grow tired of my white doe of what's-it's-name, and fancy a blue-eyed Greuze—how wonderful that man was in his manipulation of violet-hued pupils swimming in enamelled whiteness!—instead of my Murillo.

"20*th*.—I began to pack my books the day before yesterday, and yet I linger. 'Tell me, my heart, if this be love?' Not much doubt about it, I fear. But only a day or two more, and then—and then good-bye, pretty, Puritanical Susan, with your Sunday school morality, and all that innate obstinacy peculiar to quiet women. I shall have forgotten her in six weeks, I dare say. But then that consolatory idea of the future oblivion won't lessen the present anguish of parting. We may forget all about a gigantic triple-pronged carious tooth when we turn our back upon the dentist's torture-chamber, but the pang of extraction is none the less. I shall forget her, and some other eyes will haunt me in my sleep; but there must be a long blank interval of weariness before the Lethean waters can wash away that artless face. I have plumbed her simple mind to its uppermost depths, and have found nothing like deception or pretence. So we must part. I to go forth and do my best at opening the great oyster; she to remain here as my landlady's drudge and companion. Poor little thing! I hope she'll miss me when I go. I shouldn't like to think of her enjoying a flirtation with some new lodger, a city clerk, who would wear ready-made clothes bought somewhere in Shoreditch, and smoke cheap manillas. No, I shouldn't like to fancy her happy when I am gone. It wouldn't have been pleasant to the Corsair to imagine Medora flirting with mercantile mariners in his absence.

"21*st*.—I have packed all my books, except a few German cribs. Perhaps it was as well, for my studies had grown very desultory. How can a fellow read hard when there is a pretty girl in the case, and he has been so profound an idiot as to fall in love with her? But 'it is written,' as the followers of the prophet observe, and I must go. I have told Susan. We had a very affecting interview yesterday. How the poor little girl cried! and I hate to see a woman cry; it's so excruciating to the feelings of a good-hearted fellow, and the prettiest woman's nose is apt to get just a leetle red, when 'the tears come trickling down, down, down.' Oh, Susan, that I should quote that familiar ballad of Lord Lovell when I write of your sorrow! But I suppose there is something of the persifleur in my nature, for I don't often find myself very earnest about anything. And so we walked up and down the esplanade; she crying, and I talking. I flatter myself I talked rather well. There was just that dash of excitement about the business which makes a fellow talk well. But my eloquence was all of no avail; Alfred de Musset, Byron, George Sand, Rousseau, and Thomas Moore, all combined, cannot prevail against the tenets of the Sunday school; and so we are to part, 'in silence and tears, half broken-hearted to sever,' &c., unless I were prepared to sacrifice my prospects, and put the fatal noose about my neck.

"Bah! it would be too absurd, too utterly preposterous. Such things have been, and have always resulted in pretty much the same way. Your poet Shelley gets expelled from the university because he can't keep his convictions to himself, marries simple rustic maiden, grows tired of her, and falls in love with some one else, whereon rustic maiden drowns herself, whence unspeakable esclandre and confusion.

"January 2d.—No, the thing cannot be done, the sacrifice would be too great. The days of the Minerva press are past. The yellow postchaise, the lonely country inn, the college friend who is introduced in a surplice, and acts as clergyman—alas! are not these exploded with the dark ages? Were there ever any such marriages, I wonder? or were they only figments of the romancer's brain? At any rate, anything of that kind must be impossible now-a-days. And then a man must be a consummate scoundrel who could devise such a plot. I don't pretend to the Sunday school species of morality; but nemo repente fuit turpissimus as Juvenal has it. I am not so bad as that.

"5*th*.—She is very unhappy; and how hard it seems to leave her to this drudgery and desolation—Coltonslough, and my landlady, and my landlady's children, all the year round! And she is just 'the creature, not too bright or good,' &c.; the very woman, of all others, for a cottage in the lake districts, or a Devonshire fishing village, or any pretty out-of-the way haven, where a man might take his rest. And yet I must leave her here, baffled entirely by the Sunday school precepts with which her shallow mind has been endowed. I have no time to play the Lovelace, and don't want such a victory as his. I have had tiresome letters from home. They will expect me to get my degree, and I am free to confess that my reading since I have been at Coltonslough has been the merest moonshine. Decidedly I must leave this place by to-night's express. 'Better to die by sudden shock,' &c.; and as for Susan, it is only a natural chapter in such a girl's history. She will break her heart, and then marry a small tradesman, who will give her a Paisley shawl and a black silk gown to wear on Sundays.

"6*th*.—Another day, and I am still here. I was awake all last night, thinking of all manner of possibilities, or perhaps impossibilities. The yellow postchaise and the college friend in a surplice are obsolete absurdities; but how about a marriage before the registrar? Is there anything so very impossible in a marriage before the registrar—which shall not be, say, too binding? Why not a marriage before the registrar, between eight and twelve in the forenoon, with open doors, in the presence of two witnesses, &c., &c.? You walk into an office very much like any other office, and you see an official very much like any other official, and there is a trifling formula, and a little signing and countersigning, and so on, and the business is done. But even about this there would be a good deal of trouble, and the college friend would still be necessary, though not in a surplice—and the witnesses—and the office. Is the game worth the candle? Am I really so desperately in love? And then, again, supposing the game worth the cost of illumination, these sort of games are apt to be dangerous; and awkward stories crop up against one in after life; with perhaps Chancery suits, and so forth. No, it is too much trouble. It will be better for Susan and I to shake hands, like sensible people, and say good-bye.

"7*th*.—A very long talk with Susan. I told her that we must part, our roads in life lying separate, and so on. Poor child! her grief was something very terrible. We had wandered out to some lonely ground beyond the esplanade, leaving those abominable children to disport themselves as they pleased. We sat down upon a little bank at the edge of a great ploughed field, with the gray sea before us. The poor child sobbed as if her heart would have broken. I am no deliberate Lovelace, but I suppose I have in this instance pursued the prey with something of a Mexican trapper's intensity. I never meant to be in earnest; but have been drifted, as it were, by the chances of the situation; and people who let lodgings at dull watering-places really should not employ such pretty parlor maids. Poor, tender-hearted little Susie! I never thought she could have grown so fond of me, or that a little sentimental spouting, and a few pretty speeches, could have gone so far. I should have been a callous wretch if I had not been touched by her grief; and I was inexpressibly touched; so much so that I flung all good resolutions to swell the general heap of paving material for the halls of Pluto; and told my Susie that there was an alternative for this miserable parting, if she would—trust me—and consent to a marriage before the registrar.

"She will trust me. I explained to her the nature of the ceremonial I proposed, and how all unnecessary publicity and the ruin of my prospects might be avoided thereby. And then the poor little thing burst out with a whole string of romantic protestations.

"Did she want me to sacrifice my prospects? Oh, no, no! Did she want to be acknowledged before the world as my wife? No, a thousand times. She knew very well that she was too ignorant and humbly educated to support such an honor. She only wanted to know herself that she was my wife, my only lawful wife, united to me by the laws of heaven and earth.

"The laws of heaven and earth as administered in a registrar's office. I have cast prudence to the winds, and am now committed to the step which I only dreamed of as a possibility last night. I have a sort of foreboding that the business will bring me into trouble; but having gone so far now, am I to recede? and then I am really desperately in love with this Cornish girl.

"How is it to be done? These things seem so simple when one contemplates them in a dreamy reverie engendered by tobacco smoke. It will be rather a complicated business, I fear; and the college friend, that is the grand question. Who is to be the convenient college friend? Perhaps I'd better sleep upon it.

"8*th*.—After a world of serious consideration I can think of no one but my brother. He's a selfish beggar, who'd scarcely wet the tips of his fingers to save an entire ship's crew from drowning; but he owes me money, and ought to go through fire and water to serve me. At any rate, he is not troubled by any scruples or compunctions of the Sunday school order; and then he's a clever fellow, and on the spot. I'll go up to town to-morrow, and sound him about it."

There was no more. The journal ended here, and Francis Tredethlyn sat staring at the last half page, sorely puzzled as to how he was to read that broken history.

That the lines before him had been written by a heartless profligate he could scarcely doubt, little as he had been accustomed to sit in judgment upon his fellow-men. But he was slow to understand the full measure of the writer's depravity. A more subtle mind than his was required to read the hidden meaning of that carelessly written diary. Francis Tredethlyn only understood that his cousin had fallen into the hands of a selfish worldling, who had been fascinated by her pretty face, but who set his own welfare and his own happiness before all thought of her love or sorrow.

"He meant to marry her," thought the young man; "thank heaven for that. No matter how secret or clandestine the marriage may have been, it shall be my task to find Susan, and to make that marriage public."

Mr. Tredethlyn went early the next day to Gray's Inn, there to hold solemn consultation with the chief of that firm which had transacted all Oliver Tredethlyn's legal affairs during a period of some forty years.

To Mr. Kursdale, Francis told all that he had been able to discover of his cousin Susan's history; and to the lawyer's hands he confided the manuscript volume surrendered to him by Mrs. Burfield.

"You'll be able to make more out of it than I can, Mr. Kursdale," he said. "Heaven knows I read it carefully; but I can only understand that the man is a scoundrel, and that it was my cousin's evil fortune to love him. I wonder how it is that a simple, innocent country girl always does fall in love with a scoundrel, if he has only got a handsome face and a smooth tongue?"

The next day was Saturday, and Francis Tredethlyn's thoughts were strangely divided between the contemplation of his cousin's unknown wrongs and the expectation of a day in the sunny gardens and drawing-rooms at the Cedars. Late in the evening there came a letter from Mr. Kursdale, the solicitor:

Yourself and Another.

"DEAR SIR—After a very careful persual of the MS. volume entrusted to me by you yesterday, I regret to say that I can only come to one conclusion respecting the intentions of the writer.

"I believe that it was this person's design to involve Miss Susan Tredethlyn in a fictitious marriage, which should be, in fact, no marriage at all.

"A marriage before the registrar would have been as entirely valid, if duly performed, as any religious solemnization.

"I conclude, therefore, that the writer of the MS. diary contemplated a sham ceremony in the presence of some person falsely representing himself to be the superintendent registrar.

"I much fear that your cousin's simplicity would render her likely to be the dupe of any such plot.

"Should you wish to communicate with me further on this subject, I shall be glad to wait upon you at any time you may appoint.

"I am, dear sir,

"Yours very obediently,

"JAMES KURSDALE."

"A mock marriage!" thought Francis Tredethlyn. "Yes; I understand it all now. There was an insolence in his manner of writing of my pretty Susie that stung me to the very heart. No honest man ever wrote like that of any woman; no man would write like that of a woman whom he meant to make his wife."

WE cannot remember a night so dark as to have hindred the approach of coming day, nor a storm so furious or dreadful as to prevent the return of warm sunshine and cloudless sky.

DUTCH GAP CANAL, JAMES RIVER, VA.—OUTLET OF THE CANAL, THE SCENE OF THE EXPLOSION OF JAN. 1.

NEW ADVANCE ON CHARLESTON.

Our Special Artist, Mr. Crane, has sent us some sketches of the operations now progressing against Charleston, and which we trust will this time be crowned with success. In order to ascertain the position and probable strength of the enemy, Gen. Gilmore ordered a reconnoissance on James Island.

On Friday, the 27th inst., a force of infantry and artillery, under the immediate command of Gen. Schimmelfennig, crossed over from Folly Island to James Island. This is the first time our troops have visited that locality since the demonstrations made on John's Island a few months ago, under the direction of Gen. Foster. It will be remembered that at that time, after having given the enemy a sound thrashing and driven him to his strong defences, our troops withdrew to their former positions on Folly and Morris Islands. The enemy then reoccupied the whole of James Island, and, in order to resist any future assault on our part, threw up additional earthworks at the southern end, and increased his force of men. The late attack was made in the afternoon, the troops having been occupied in the morning in disembarking.

Everything being in readiness, a line of battle was formed on the southern end of the island, and a body of skirmishers sent forward to feel the enemy. They had advanced but about one mile when they discovered just in their front a long line of earthworks, behind which, it was subsequently ascertained, were posted 3,000 rebels. As our skirmishers advanced, fire was opened from a few pieces of light artillery which had been placed in position a short distance at the rear. The gunboat McDonough and the mortar schooner Smith moved up the Stono river, and joined in the fight by throwing shells into the woods where the rebels had formed their line of battle. The tinclads Savannah and Augusta, under the command of Ensign Neil, also took an important part in the general movement. Late in the day, the howitzers were removed from the tinclads and placed on shore; but unfortunately, while the men were hauling the pieces to the front, one of them became mired and could not be extricated in time to be brought into service that day. The remaining guns were worked with good effect. The enemy having been shelled pretty thoroughly, a signal was given for our line of battle to advance and seize the outer works of the enemy. Away went the men with a bound and a yell, and in 15 minutes time they had possession of three redoubts and taken 30 prisoners, including a Major of a South Carolina regiment. The force that defended the redoubts were infantry, nearly all of whom took to flight when our men made the dash upon them. Our loss was 14 killed and 30 wounded. The enemy's loss in killed and wounded could not be ascertained.

The ground gained by the assault is held by our troops, to-day, and it is quite possible that we may see some heavy fighting within a short time. The enemy have erected new and formidable works on the upper portion of James Island, but we believe that by proper management those works can be captured.

OLD CHURCH NEAR SAVANNAH, GA.—FROM A SKETCH BY CAPT. GEO. W. WOODWARD, OF THE 21ST REGT. MICHIGAN VOLS.

INTERESTING OLD CHURCH NEAR SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

THIS venerable structure is on the Ebenezer river, 20 miles N. W. from Savannah, and has stood for nearly a century, the bricks having been brought over from England in 1769. It is close to Fort Green, a Revolutionary relic, and in 1777 was used as a hospital by the American troops under Gen. Green. It has been kept in good repair.

FORT FISHER, N. C.

WE continue our sketches of that far-famed fortress, which the London Times said, the day after the news reached Europe of Gen. Butsen's retreat from Fort Fisher, could never be taken, and select from a large number those of the most immediate interest. As we write the neighborhood is the scene of combined operations, which have now, most probably, already ended in the capture of Wilmington; for it is evident that as experienced and daring a soldier as Gen. Schofield would not have been transferred from the scene of his recent exploits in Tennessee to North Carolina, without Gen. Grant had determined to make a heavy blow in that quarter.

NEW ADVANCE UPON CHARLESTON—THE GUNBOAT COM. M'DONOUGH, AND A MORTAR BOAT, SHELLING THE REBEL POSITION ON JAMES ISLAND, S. C. FEB. 9.—SKETCHED BY OUR ARTIST, W. T. CRANE.

Fort Caswell,

Which is nine miles from Fort Fisher and five from Smithville, was taken possession of by our troops soon after the surrender of the last-named place, the enemy having destroyed as much as possible by explosions. It is now, however, stronger than ever, and occupied by U. S. troops.

Smithville

Is a post village, about two miles from Fort Caswell, and situated on the west side of Cape Fear river or inlet. It is a place of small importance, and contains about 400 inhabitants, principally engaged in fishing. Some idea of its primitive condition may be formed of it from the jail and gallery, of which we give sketches.

Union Earthworks.

Our Artist has sent us a masterly resting sketch of the earthworks on the point of Gen. Terry's army on the eastern bank of Cape Fear river, which we have reproduced. They are about three miles above Fort Fisher, and about the same distance from Wilmington.

Cotton Breastworks.

The rebels had made some of their earthworks impervious to our shot by rolling cotton as a breastwork, and covering it with sand about 10 inches deep. Our soldiers soon discovered it, and it was dug up in great quantities and used for the more comfortable beds.

The Signal Light.

Of which we give a sketch, is situated on the Mound battery, formerly in the possession of the rebels, but it is now used by our own troops as a decoy both for the purpose of deceiving and entrapping blockade-runners, two having been captured by these means a few days ago. The other sketches require no description beyond their captions.

THE SHERMANS.—Samuel Sherman emigrated from England to Stratford, Connecticut, in 1635. He was a man of note in his time—a Puritan of the Cromwell school—and one of the original proprietors of Stratford, Connecticut, where the family still is. His descendant, Daniel Sherman, was contemporaneous with Roger Sherman, the only patriot known who was several degrees removed. Daniel Sherman was early distinguished for the ability and great influence He was a member of the Committee of Safety in Connecticut, during the Revolution, and served for 65 consecutive sessions, or 32½ years, as the representative of his native town in the General Assembly of Connecticut. A good many ancestors are kind of him, which perhaps he has been; full of humor as well as full of sense. He died shortly after the adoption of the Constitution. His son, Taylor Sherman, was Roger Sherman's grandfather. Taylor was a lawyer in Norwalk, Connecticut, and became a judge. He was one of the Commissioners sent by the State of Connecticut in defense of the State, in Ohio, now constituting the counties of Huron and Erie. These lands were ceded by connecticut to the United States by the Revolutionary Tories of the war of the Revolution, and were afterwards colonized by non-combatants. Taylor was also the ownership of some of those lands, probably dressed the allotment of a share out of Judge Sherman's. Charles R. Sherman—in Ohio. He went thither when just of school age, and completed his education and established by the rich waters of the Rockaborg, at the town of Norwalk, where he soon banded. He settled at Lancaster as a lawyer, soon attained eminence, and became a judge of the Court of Common Pleas in 1821, and died in 1829, while on the Bench at Lebanon, Ohio. By the concurring testimony of all the old lawyers of Ohio he had rare abilities as an advocate, and was a genial, liberal and popular citizen. He left six sons, of whom five are now living. Gen. Sherman was born in 1820. Charles J. Sherman, who has been published at his uncle, is his eldest brother. Senator Sherman is three years his junior.

To preserve dahlia roots, they should be dug up as soon as the first hard frost has spoiled their foliage. Cut the stem about an inch above the tuber; then lay them up in dry. After they have become dry, pack them in the cellar, where to remain until they begin to grow in the spring; then plant them out in the borders, previously dividing the roots if an increase is required.

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical
PINEAPPLE CIDER
IS A PREVENTIVE OF SICKNESS. The experience of Dr. Talbot has taught him that Twenty-four Hours is a virus in this climate that no remedy has been discovered that will prevent at that time. The cause referred to Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, destroyed the virus without producing, or at least giving the least sickness to the system. Dr. Talbot has been using it for his own family for over one year. This is rather a new mode of introducing medicine to the public, but I think it will be found a good one. It is a delicious beverage, and has no disagreeable taste. It is a benefit to any person in any climate, but is valuable to persons who are subject to chills, fever and ague, and bilious complaints. Dr. Talbot's Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that in almost the first application of it, will break up the chill. It continues its use as above directed, and finds it very beneficial. It has proved a perfect preventive in sickness in his case. Also another well-known gentleman in New York has used Dr. Talbot's Cider constantly on ten years, and has not been sick one day during the time.

CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direct poisons, under the name of medicines, that we should call attention to compounds purporting to be medicinal, but not a with Sarsaparillas, are found in the world. We refer to the Sarsaparilla, and the public should fully understand that Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is the only reliable stimulative and tonic that are imported, and that Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is the only fancy article containing alcohol that has merited popular favor. The CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these poisons, but are a combination of pure Juices of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable aromatic, anti-bilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the certificates which have been voluntarily tendered are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional and social walk of life, in all sections of the country, and are unimpeachable.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

JOHN BULL.—"Ah! would you? I Drop that piece of pie, you young rascal; I don't mean to have any taken away while I'm here."

What is it was that changed Miss Flora McFlimsey from a Fashionable Girl into a Sensible Woman.

"Or May!" said Miss Flora McFlimsey one day,
"We must buy no more goods of importers, they say,
"We must study economy—Going out Fly!
"So a sewing machines I'm determined to buy,
"Now which is the best I pray you, for you know,
"You have tried every kind—you do nothing but sew.
"Which is your favorite? and don't tell Ellen"
May answered meinder, "Why—WILLCOX & GIBBS.

"'Tis a dear little beauty, a bright busy bee,
"The Shuttle is surely a model
"You can learn all its ways in a single half hour,
"And find that you've gained an all conquering power.
"'Tis so noiseless and neat! 'tis a sweet little elf;
"To the rich it brings ease; for the poor it makes pelf.
"I never have seen that sweep pain in the side;
"And I owe his great comfort to WILLCOX & GIBBS."

Miss Flora returned, not a moment would wait,
But down down Broadway to five hundred and eight,
Up the Broadway, in the fourth—and through all her striving,
A look in her face showed that she had been thriving;
She bought a machine; then homeward she hied,
A little child's sewing for practice she tried.
And would you believe it? two nice little bibs
She made in an hour, to the envy of Gibbs.

Amazed and delighted, no note did she take
Of time, or the lover who came in the wake,
For her every day work, and greatest pleasure while,
With mountains all waxed, and expression all silky,
In vain did he sadly her, and swear like a Turk,
Extol the dignity, beauty, and goodness of work;
She'd all changed it! "Had her dear Ally! I never tell that,
The final reply of WILLCOX & GIBBS. o

ARCANA WATCH.
An Elegant Novelty in Watches.
The cause of this watch was an entirely new invention, composed of six different metals combined, rolled between and plaindred, producing the exact imitation of 18 carat gold, called Arcana, which, will always keep its color. They are as beautiful and durable as solid gold, and are afforded at one-eighth the cost. The case is beautifully engraved, with Pearl and Shield for name, with Patent Push Pin, and engraved in the exact style of the celebrated Solid Gold Hunting Cases, and are really luminous and durable, and so exact in imitation of gold as to defy detection. The movement is manufactured by the well-known St. James Watch Company of Europe, and are expressly finished having engraved plates, fancy carved bridges, adjusting regulator, with quick motion, and the jeweled with genuine rubies, with fine dial and skeleton hands, and is warranted a good timekeeper. These watches are of three different sizes, the smallest being for ladies, and are all Hunting Cases. A case of one is no case for Express for $12. A single one sent in an elegant Morocco Case for $15, will easily pass for one worth $100 each. We are the sole agents for this watch in the United States, and none are genuine which do not bear our Trade Mark.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 493—VOL. XIX.] NEW YORK, MARCH 11, 1865. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. 13 WEEKS $1 00.

THE OLD FLAG AGAIN ON SUMTER—RAISED (ON A TEMPORARY STAFF FORMED OF AN OAR AND A BOATHOOK) BY CAPT. H. M. BRAGG, OF GEN. GILLMORE'S STAFF, FEB. 18.—SKETCHED ON THE SPOT BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, W. T. CRANE.

Barnum's American Museum.

Afternoon at 3. Evening at 7½. Triumphant success of the Great One Thousand Dollar Premium, written by Miss Lizzie Doten, entitled the WONDERFUL GIFT OF NEW LIFE, or the ELIXIR OF DRINK, pronounced by the press and people as A SCREAMING SUCCESS! A day of unexpected LAUGHS OF PERPETUAL MIRTH. One of Two Vases, with practical illustrations of the great temperance lecture, to be given away at the Lecture Room, Lingard Dances, first Prof. Hutchings, Lightning Calculator, Two Fat Women, Living Skeleton, Three Giants, 34 feet high; Woodroffe's Bohemian Opera Troupe, the two grand Star Engleses in ordinary Wax Figures, taken from Life, of Mrs. Gen. Grant, Twelve and Baby, Lincoln, Davis, Dwarf, Albino Family, Living Cotton, French Moving Figures, Aquaria, Monstrosities, &c. Admission 30 cents; Children under 10, 15 cents.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Almanac for 1865.

The list edition of this valuable work of reference is now ready. Those of our readers who desire a copy should make immediate application. It is useless at this date to say more to the public the manifold features of interest in the publication, their appreciation is high attested by the popular demand. It is in fact a complete compendium of all sorts of information of universal interest. There are over two hundred original articles mostly illustrated, besides biographic portraits of Lincoln and Everett, executed in a style of high art. Information for the people has rarely been condensed in such an attractive form. It is considered a model work in its prototype, the London Illustrated Almanac, while the price, 50 cents, is lower.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Illustrated Almanac for 1865.

This annual contains a great amount of useful and entertaining information than any publication of the kind ever issued. It is indeed a only Lady's Illustrated Almanac published. It is embellished with over 70 beautiful engravings, by the first Artists of the day, executed in the highest style of art. It contains directions for Health, Beauty, Cookery, Needle work, every kitchen, garden, nursery and sick-room. In a word, it is the manual to make home attractive, as the young lady's companion, and it also not be found in every household. It is sufficiently cheap to place within the reach of all. Portraits of Mrs. Lincoln and Mrs. McClellan exquisitely engraved on steel, and a graphic Bohemian Story of Lizzie Branch, printed on fine paper. This complete Lady's Manual of 128 pages, is more readable than many a three volume novel—and only 50 cents. It will be sent, postage free, on receipt of the price, either in currency or postage stamps. Address

To Correspondents.

The columns of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER are always open for contributions from good writers.

All communications will be promptly considered; and liberal prices will be paid for all manuscripts that are deemed worthy of acceptance.

Interesting stories, lively sketches, and poems of a high order of merit, will not be long kept waiting for a reward with favor.

Short stories, fraught with incident, character and dramatic effect, are always preferable to long ones.

All manuscripts should be legibly written, on good paper, and on one side of the sheets. Manuscripts written on both sides will be declined without examination.

Correspondents are requested to write their names and addresses legibly and in full, on each manuscript that they send to the editor.

Persons wishing the return of rejected manuscripts, by mail, must, in all cases, forward stamps for the prepayment of postage.

The Fall of Charleston.

The great event of the day is the capture of Charleston, the proud but recalcitrant "City of Sin." The rebel journals seek consolation for its fall in the fact that it was not taken by assault, but tell, without a struggle, into the hands of the national army, from which it was the cradle of secession. Perhaps we ought not to object to such ex post facto consolations, and we are prepared to find our rebel friends of the Richmond press, when they have started on the very hard road which the Vicksburg Avalanche, the Atlanta Constitutional, the Savannah Republican, and the Mobile Register and Mercury have travelled, before them—we say we are prepared to find their dingy columns rather heavy stretches, and poems of the execution of Richmond, one of the very certain "blessings in disguise" that is constantly showering on and of which Memphis, Nashville, Vicksburg, New Orleans, Atlanta, Savannah, Charleston, Columbia and Wilmington are such cheering examples. Sublime optimism! Rare avatars of Pootz, to whom everything was of "no consequence," and of Mark Tapley, who ever ejaculated, "Now isn't this jolly?" Well, to use a cant phrase, "that's so!" We have all heard of the husband who was reproached with permitting his wife to beat him—"Never mind; it pleases her and it doesn't hurt me!" The occupation of the "forts and places," concerning which Mr. Lincoln made his proclamations, is pleasant to us and beneficial to our enemies, and so everybody is suit fied!

Seriously, there is something very sad in the coincidence crimsoner than the reddest dahlia of the Seventh Ward, that Sumter was mercifully the sword that pierces their vitals, and which is driving straight at their hearts. Sumter is decayed by the slow but sure process. Their sense of satisfaction is something between a wail of helplessness and a howl of impotent rage. The Eternal God has decreed their destruction, and the sentence of the overslowing on them with relentless force are only the instruments of His Will. Let them accept their fate with the humility which becomes men who made a long and desperate appeal to arbitrament, while the "Confederate States are all she stronger in consequence!" We have only to turn to our files to find the speech of the Governor of South Carolina, on the occasion of the "glorious capture" of Fort Sumter, with his garrison of 70 men. It is made up of brave words. Strategy.

"I hope to-morrow, Sabbath though it be, that under the protection of Providence, and under the orders of Gen. Beauregard, or one of the officers of the Confederate States, you shall have the proud gratification of seeing the flag of the Confederate States float on that Confederate flag of three free and independent States, that has floated over it for three days, unless you have been pulled down by cannon balls. [Applause.] I am here only to say to it the first time, that the flag of the Confederate States of America have been humbled. It has triumphed for a week, and that flag, on the 4th of March, will be established, a humbled nation the glorious little State of South Carolina. And I propose to ask here, before the civilized world, your dependence is baptized in the blood of the heroes who went upon a glorious battlefield, and upon fire redoubts and for ever, in defiance of the world in arms."

Is this the Beauregard that we heard of last lying for life and in indecent haste from the capital of South Carolina, in company with a distinguished "with a few thousand dollars to be Treasury?" Where are those flags that were to "float for ever" over the walls of Sumter? Where is that "sea of blood" into which the "invaders" were to be driven, and which he replaced by the symbol of the Union? "In defiance of a World in arms!" And that from men who are fastidiously calling on their very slaves to serve them, and who have driven themselves under the dominion of England or France, or even of effete and nerveless Spain, and endure the satrapsy of a Bourbon or a Hapsburg, if only to get a recognition of their unhappy existence! These are the men who were Americans! These are the men who mouthed, and ranted, and beat their breasts like Du Chaillu's gorilla, and declared that Christmas-time like very Chinese only four years ago! Their Generalissimo, Lee, he in whom their Lifeboy hopes are centred, tells them that they are lost, and their only hope is to be cajoled and sentenced Sambo, whose tenure of a seat was doubled, and whose employment in the Northern camps was "on outrage on civilization and religion"—that is to say, that black and sinewy arm can push back the clustering legions of the Union! Their employment, says he, "is not the most necessary." Necessary! "The blows must be given or we perish!" is the lugubrious echo of the Richmond Enquirer.

How pitiful, we repeat, under circumstances like these, and in face of dangers greater than ever beset an unarmed people, the contrast of the present, to grin, and smirk, and affect to be buoyant and happy! Men of the South, if you you must, weep over dead men around you, mock your fate as Isaac did, and cut your throats on the brink of the grave. Admit, as sober men should, that you can hold no position which is not assailed by the bullets and shot; that in the loss of all your ports, in the severance of your so-called Confederacy by the occupation of the Mississippi, and in the ease with which a Union Gen-eral can penetrate the Carolinas, in contempt of your most strenuous efforts to oppose him—admit that all this proves your struggle hopeless to every reasoning mind. Fight it out with another year's bloody and shed more blood, so that your son may sink, as you have always and it should, with dramatically, "in agony see, I leave off "your damnable faces and begin!" Run away from Richmond, as you soon will be glad to do, but don't talk to us of the "blessings" which follow the evacuation.

There was a time, and that's not long ago, when it was the custom to picture ad Americans as tall and scrawny, knock-kneed and shoddy. Whatever of truth there may have been in the allegation that we were long and thin, the fact no longer remains. Let any one absent himself from the country for a couple of years, and he will be astonished on his return to find his fellow Yankees, as a whole, fuller, deep-chested and fresher in aspect than the corresponding classes he has been accustomed to see abroad. There are more stoop-shouldered, pallid, and even hollow men to be seen in a day's walk in London, than will be met with in a week in New York. We made those remarks to a friend, the Peripatetic Philosopher, who nodded assent.

"But Leibnitz says there is nothing without reason,"

"And Leibnitz was right, sir. I told you last week that our new effluence of handsome girls came of shoddy. The change in the men, sir, comes of whiskey."

"Whiskey!"

"Yes, sir, Bourbon. It operates on masculine bodies as cod-liver oil does on females. High colored beef, dressed French luxuries, vile concoctions called Schnapps, and have done away with Absinthe—which, by the way, they say is rapidly superseding the Eau de Paris. When I was last in Bordeaux I saw how French brandy was made. A vessel laden with raw spirits was anchored in the bay, and a saw is steaming and smoking away like a volcano, for many days. What do you think they were doing? They had a belt of solid oak timber which was stepped up the spirit with the steam, that is to say the residue of stems and skins of the grape, left after the expressure of the juice, with the vineyards. And the product was 'Otard,' such as we have been poisoning ourselves with these fifty years. The vessel moved off empty, and consequently paid no duty on her spirits. You see how it was done, don't you? Now Bourbon is a pure and healthful drink, and, in moderation, as everything good in the world must be to avoid bad consequences. Ask any of your stout friends, accidentally of course, to partake of the change, and he will be able to tell you. Ask him, then, if he ever uses Bourbon, and ten to one he will tell you 'Yes.' That's it, sir, Bourbon and Beef."

"But, sir, we have a duty to perform, in our high capacity as custodians of public morals. We can't recommend Bourbon to their people."

"You wouldn't. Let them ask their family physician. You wanted me to explain why our people were getting fat, and I did so. I repeat, it's bourbon."

And the philosopher, offended, put on his hat with a jerk, and, muttering something about what "effluences the custodians of public morals have of their duty, and that people would drink Bourbon and Beef whether or not," left the conclusions to us.

A recent London paper contains an American paragraph, the same who has discovered the rocks of the Hudson with his vile advertisements of bitters, cosmetics, pills, salves, syrups and cream, the same who invaded the sanctity of Egypt with two painted placards of "Plantation Bitters." We are glad to learn that a petition, signed by numerous physicians, has reached the Queen of our state, praying for penal enactments against the defacement of curbstones, walls, fences, and other objects of public utility by these vile advertisements. Whole regions of beauty have been made offensive through the license that has permitted a few men to make fortunes by covering the boulders with "hair dye" in huge characters. Things of veneration as well as of beauty are constantly defaced. We have before which nothing is sacred, and from which no privacy, public interest or personal feeling is safe. Let a step be taken in no many directions as follows as into the very recesses of the country, where we seek refuge from the blare and thumbing of the town. Let the Old Man of the Mountain be chiseled through-out and small natural grandeur, and the charms of woodland and river, be visited by poltroons and quacks. Let the Falls of Niagara be surveyed in all things, and illegal fines cannot be restrained or arrested by public opinion, let it be appealed by the Queen to her people. Let us would not delight to sily an unsavory egg at the head of the wretch who has doubted over the Highlands with nauseous nauseous compounds of "balm" and of nostrums for clearing diseases, which torture the eye o taste and reflect disgrace on the community? Let the Lamplighter be made to prowl in great resorts of summer travel by criminal enactments against this most offensive form of vandalism, and the most summary punishment. The dirty dogs who do this sort of thing from her territories. Tarring and feathering seems to be a disreputable kind o punishment, but we sincerely think which the greatest stickler for formal justice would wink at if it visited on the vagabonds who perambulate the country in the shape of quacks, and daub over the rocks with their vile advertisements. Let our country literde put on the admissive technothine that the Lamplighter may be well-filled before, and then send for our "special Artist." We shall delight to depict "the outrage," confident that the public will render the hearty verdict—"Served him right."

The safest and best investment that can be made by people of limited means is that offered by the Government loan, now before the public, and being rapidly absorbed, known as the "Seven-thirty." It is issued in denominations to suit all classes of purchasers—$50, $100, $500, $1,000 and $5,000—and the interest accrues as follows:

One cent per day on a bond of	$50
Two cents per day on a bond of	100
Ten cents per day on a bond of	500
Twenty cents per day on a bond of	1,000
A new dollar per day on a bond of	5,000

The interest is payable in the form of coupons on the 15th of August and the 15th of February. The holder can cut these off and get them cashed at any bank or broker's in the country.

The bonds are due on the 15th of August, 1867. At that time, if the holder does not want his money, he can demand of the Government to exchange his matured three-per-cents for the famous Five-twenty gold bearing six per cent. bonds. These bonds are now at a premium of eleven per cent. The three-per-cents are selling at an average rate of $3,000,000 per day. A great part of this is taken up by the people and soldiers in sums of $50 and $100. A recent regiment sent in its front took one hundred and fifty $100 last week.

The passage of the Amendment to the Constitution abolishing Slavery was commenced at Newburyport, Mass., in a striking and appropriate manner. John G. Whittier, the Quaker Anti-Slavery poet, whose name and fame have been thrown for many years into his opposition to the system, delivered conscientious, constributed a hymn on the occasion, which has all the verve and spirit of his productions of twenty-five years ago, when his unheeded song was almost the only one dedicated to Freedom and Freedom's God. He does not claim now to be apotheosed as the sole champion of the principles for which he contended so long and faithfully, luck in the spirit of the suffering and lowly Saviour, whose message to this land was men and true through whose suffering and blood the bon now vouchsafed to us was rendered sure.

Not unto us who did but seek
The word that God would have us speak,
Nor unto us this day belong
The triumph and the song.

Upon us fell in early youth
The burden of unwelcome truth,
And left us weak and poor, and few,
The censor's painful work to do.

Thenceforth on us in light bestows,
The sin we rebuked and its shames;
For not with gnawed and entombed bone
We build the sepulchres of our own.

We bore, as freedom's hope forlorn,
The private hate, the public scorn;
Yet felt within our hearts the nod
Our faith in man and trust in God.

We prayed and hoped; but still with swa,
The country of the free by law
We heard the snarling clamor of doom,
And saw the shadow of fetters fall on room.

We hoped for peace; our eyes survey
The bloodred dawn of freedom's day!
We prayed for love and union dear;
The storm by battle axe in wrath.

Nor skill nor strength nor zeal of ours
Has turned and loosed the hunters' powers;
Not by our hands is turned the key
That sets the shackled captive free.

A redder sun than Egypt's wave
Is plied and parted for the slave;
A darker cloud than that by night,
A terror more legible by night!

The praise, O Lord! be Thine alone,
In Thy sole work the glory known;
Our poor gifts at Thy feet we cast,
To whom be glory first and last.

Accounts to a Parisian expositor of the fashionable world, criminate the present habit of its fast banishment from aristocratic circles. It particularly draws the attention of the followers of fashion to the fact that at the ball held at the Tuileries, her imperial majesty, dressed with her usual exquisite taste, exhibited sure grand scheitle of the Empress Josephine. Melodramaya, the way of expressing the absence of that detestable cage which adds so much to female dimensions. The Empress Josephine, it appears, has been imitated by all those who have pretensions to mingle in the circles of fashionable life.

The latest number of the London Athenæum is trenchant, not to say savage, on American books. Of the "Woman's Rights" case it says, in a few lines: "The Woman's Rights cause does not need such champions as this author, who is more zealous than discreet, and whose book is remarkable for impulsiveness rather than sagacity." Of John G. Saxe's "Clever Stories of Many Nations," he says that the best fun in it is shallow. The rest seems to be sprightly and is only childish." The "Familiar Letters from Europe" of the late Professor Felton, of Harvard, are characterized: "They are indiscreet. They are incorrect. They are insipid."

Summary of the War.

THE CAROLINAS.

The occupation of Charleston on the 19th of February, by the Union forces, commanded by Admiral Dahlgren and Gen. Gilmore, has been followed by the capture of Fort Anderson on the the same day. Immediately after the evacuation of Fort Anderson, the fleet under his command pushed forward as far as Georgetown, towards Wilmington. After sounding and buoying out the middle ground at Big Island, he succeeded in getting over the bar, and, on the morning of the 20th, Fort Strong, the fort commanding the principal obstructions, where the rebels had also sunk a number of vessels in the channel. Our fire soon drove the rebels away from the fort. On the night of the 20th inst. the rebels sent down 200 floating torpedoes; but the Admiral had a strong force on picket-boats out, and the torpedoes were sunk with musketry.

On the 21st February the Union army, under Gen. Terry, took possession of Wilmington, which Gen. Hoke and his rebel troops had abandoned during night previous, burning all the cotton they could by their hands on.

VIRGINIA.

The horrible state of the roads prevents any active operations. The Richmond papers say that Gen. Lee has gone to defeat Gen. Sherman, having left Gen. Joe Johnstone in command at Richmond. Gen. Sherman's movements are not reported now by the rebel press, but the last accounts say he was advancing upon that vicinity.

NEW BOOKS, &c.

Forest Pictures in the Adirondacks. By John A. Hows. With Original Poems, by Alfred B. Street. New York: James G. Gregory.

This exquisitely printed book for the centre table contains sixteen finely engraved pictures on wood of characteristic Adirondack scenery, with appropriate poems by Mr. Street, the most successful of our poets of nature. The drawing in the engravings is minutely truthful, without that sacrifice of general effect which so often attends on attention to detail. No one who has spent his summer vacation in the Adirondacks can fail to recognise in every picture some familiar friend: the gnarled, fallen tree on which he sat; the mossy rock whereon he breakfasted, or beside which he built his camp-fire; the deep, dark pool, up to which he stole to decoy the leaping trout; the gray distant mountain, half-hidden by the heavily-clothed hemlocks; and the quiet lake, rippled only by the wake of the fast swimming loon. Mr. Street's part of the work is characteristically clever. Mr. Street has traversed well the dim aisles of our great northern park, where mountain and forest, lake and river combine to make up scenes of beauty, of wildness and grandeur, paralleled nowhere else in our country, and he brings to its illustration the feeling which comes not of admiration alone, but of deep and holy sympathy. It is pleasant to hear again from Mr. Street, who has been silent far too long. The laureate of our natural beauties must not falter in his devoir.

"The Northern Magazine, a monthly eclectic journal for the people," under the direction of the well-known artist, Mr. Frank Bellew, presents its appeal to the public for support. It is a quarto of 16 pages, well printed and illustrated, varied in matter and unexceptionable in tone.

TOWN GOSSIP.

We have gone out of winter in the mildest manner possible, and are trusting to the promises of this treacherous March—most capricious and ill-tempered of months. There is something in the name, however, that is pleasant, in spite of the way he treats us—one begins to dream of green leaves and early flowers, and have visions of the country, and long for the free life that one enjoys there. But the truth is that spring, like morning, is all very well to talk about and for poets to rave over, but the less one knows of the reality of either the better for his temper and comfort.

The world wants to be well aired and sunned before one makes one's daily appearance, and it is just so where the morning of the year is concerned—letting June stand for 10 o'clock, we will call it a decent hour to rise, before that one ought to lie quiet as a dormouse.

The anniversary of Washington's birthday was celebrated this year with unusual enthusiasm and rejoicing. The weather was magnificent—the very finest of the little troop of Italian days that descended upon us without the slightest warning. The city was got up in its brightest holiday wear—flags floated upon the house-tops, and the public edifices were decorated with the most lavish display of banners. The parades and reviews went off in the most brilliant style—the evening's treat of fireworks was particularly fine, and balls were as plenty as blackberries in August.

The great news of the week—the tidings that Charleston was ours—undoubtedly had much to do with the general spirit of rejoicing which pervaded the city. The most lukewarm heart must have throbbed a little quickly to think that the dear old flag once more floated over the walls from which it was first torn by the black hand of treason.

It seems, according to the Richmond Whig, that among the sufferers by Sherman's victorious approach was William Gilmore Sims, the novelist, poet, playwriter, and everything else possible in the literary line. It appears that he ran so precipitately from his dwelling that he was forced to leave behind a valuable library of 7,000 volumes. Very probably his own books made up a goodly portion of the number—in which case we congratulate Mr. S. most heartily on the necessity for the sudden flight which enabled him to lose their society for ever.

Some man insists upon it that if women are going to claim their share in the professions which our old fogyish progenitors regarded as belonging to the masculine portion of humanity, that they shall give their titles a feminine ending—though, goodness knows, the reason therefor is not apparent. He cites a whole page of words with terminations suited to both sexes, and winds up by proposing a new title for our countrywomen in general. They are to be called Americanesses. He says:

"The name is definite and dignified" (note the alliteration), "and seems to give the idea of nationality which no other form of expression can so well convey."

By way of showing how prettily the word looks and sounds, he bursts into unpremeditated song:

"Fair women from Europe graced the ball,
A fair Americaness eclipsed them all."

The poetry settles the matter at once—we accept the change he proposes without a dissentient murmur, but at the same time we are somewhat afraid that his countrywomen may take the termination he tacks on to their name for his whole cognomen, with a little alteration in the vowel.

The matter of rents becomes a more serious question every day, and how people are to live at all will apparently very soon become a problem exceedingly difficult of solution. It is true that where a great many are concerned one doesn't see the necessity of their continuing existence any more than Talleyrand did when he made his amiable and famous answer to a question of a similar nature, but nevertheless live they must, and hence we demand—how?

Unless a man can have a petroleum well burst out in his backyard or own an uncle who has ruined his soul and filled his bankbook by means of shoddy speculations, his hold on existence is likely to be as precarious as that of a shipwrecked sailor clinging to the sharp end of a spar.

Houses that have formerly rented for $600 have gone up to $1,500, and these by no means in a locality which hunters after fashion and elegance would be at all ready to choose, provided there were such a thing as choice left.

With many men in professions and trades rents will swallow up half their incomes; because, unfortunately, incomes in general have not gone up in proportion to the inflation of currency or the abominable prices charged for everything that goes to support human comfort and life.

What becomes of young lawyers, doctors, teachers, writers, and so on, with their pretty little wives and olive branches?—even echo does not make the slightest sign of response.

Setting aside the painful part of it—a thing we are as fond of doing always as Harold Skimpole himself—certain it is that we are going to have a year of great expense, and the sooner people make up their minds that they have got to live soberly and quietly the better. No city has equalled New York as a place where extravagant habits have been indulged in spite of moderate incomes, and we trust that henceforth the reproach may die away, since in spite of jests and sneers, it really reflects upon the character of the whole community where principle, honesty and several other old-fashioned virtues are concerned.

Rossiter, the artist, is exhibiting at the Milton Gallery five pictures illustrating subjects in Paradise Lost. They are works of very great merit in all respects—the figures admirably conceived and executed, and the accessories of the landscape worked up with great strength and brilliancy. The first picture represents Eve in her bower—the second, Adam and his spouse spellbound by the beauties of sunrise in Paradise—the third shows the pair in the glory of morn, with Eve holding back the fatal apple from her companion's grasp. The other two paintings are descriptive of events after the fall—in the last, Adam is stationed on an eminence from which he regards the world and seems to be striving for fortitude to bear the new life which has opened so suddenly before him. The pose of the figure is exceedingly fine, and the entire treatment of the picture truly admirable.

Maretzek has fulfilled the most important pledge with which he commenced the season, and given us Verdi's latest opera, "La Forze del Destino."

The libretto, if not strikingly original, has the merit of great light and shade, passing from the religious ceremonies of a monastery to the wild revels of camp life, from fun and jollity to suffering and despair, and consequently affording free scope for strong contrasts and masterly effects on the part of the composer. The plot is exceedingly tragic—indeed, the closing act kills off people in a way only equalled in Hamlet, where there is no farther use for a ghost because there is no one left to see it.

The music is brilliant, full of Verdi's peculiar mannerisms, but possessing a versatility, a depth of feeling and intensity which seem the leading characteristics that distinguish it from many others of the composer's works. Whether it is to carry out the boast made for it of being the finest of modern operas remains yet to be proved.

Even on the first night the different rôles were well sustained by the performers, and Mademoiselle Morensi in particular, in the part of a vivandiere, appeared to better advantage than we have ever seen her.

Strakosch's new artists have met with great success. Mademoiselle de Katow, the violoncellist, has made a sensation; more than that, even on her first appearance she proved conclusively that she was a rare musical genius. The instrument is not a graceful one for a woman to handle, but she overcomes all those difficulties, nor is there any evidence of physical effort or exertion in her playing.

The pianist, Mr. Wehli, made a most favorable impression; and a pleasant thing about him, aside from his surprising talent and skill, is the unpretending way in which he plays, with a manner entirely free from the flourishes and affectations in which so many of our famous performers are wont to deal.

Barnum has brought out a new piece called "The Workingmen of New York," which is likely to have an endless run. It is written by that most charming of actresses, Miss Laura Keene, whose genius, we know of old, is versatile enough to make her successful in whatever she undertakes, whether in her own profession or one of the sister arts. Are we never to have her back among us, we wonder? Her place is most dolefully vacant, and one laments her absence more and more when they recall her power of depicting whatever was tender, womanly and pathetic—her wondrous fascination in comedy, whether personating some simple peasant girl or the highbred woman of fashion—the melody of her voice, which went straight to every heart, working with strange sympathy on her hearers, and the varied power of expression which her face possessed in so remarkable a manner.

We trust before much more time elapses that we shall see her again established here in a theatre of her own, certain that she will find herself a greater favorite than ever after her long absence.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The Working Men's Union held a mass meeting at the Cooper Institute, on the evening of the 21st. It was fully attended. Mr. Harding was called to the chair. Resolutions declarative of the right of the working classes to remunerative wages, with fair recreation, were unanimously adopted.

—— There is a desperate effort making to bolster up the price of gold, so to keep it as near as possible to 200.

—— It is worthy of mention that the Boston and Worcester Railroad transported last year over 2,000,000 persons, and only killed two of them—a fact worthy of the imitation of all others.

—— Pouring cold water on the face will destroy the effect of any narcotic.

—— The people of New Orleans held a meeting lately to consider the propriety of closing their places of public amusement on the Sunday.

—— Among the bills recently passed by the Missouri Legislature are these: Providing that any person whose husband or wife has been engaged in the rebellion against the United States shall be entitled to a divorce on proper application to the courts. Providing that no licence to transact business shall be granted to any foreigner who has not first taken steps to become naturalised.

—— A correspondent informs us that a panther, measuring seven feet two inches in length, was killed near Chazy Lake, Clinton county, New York, on the night of the 10th inst., 10 miles from any house, after a 10 days' chase. Photographs have been taken, and the body, while frozen, will be exhibited in various parts of the country.

—— A new line of steamers is to be established between Boston and Liverpool.

—— A party of Maine hunters came into Portland last week with three tons of venison.

—— A few young ladies of a Soldiers' Aid Society at Brookfield, Mass., gave a teaparty last week, and the result was $400 net gain for the soldiers' benefit.

—— Mayor Thomas, of St. Louis, writes: "I know only of two instances in which colored persons have been received at the City Hospital, and in both instances I paid their expenses out of my own pocket."

—— Game has rapidly increased in Connecticut since 1861, when the game law was passed, and a game club in Hartford declare their determination to prosecute any violation of the law that comes to their knowledge.

—— John B. Brown has given to the Portland (Maine) School Committee $5,000 in memory of his son, James Olcott Brown, to buy medals for the high school and establish scholarships in Bowdoin College.

—— A lady in Charlestown, Mass., left her bed and started for Boston in a fit of somnambulism, a few nights since, and did not awake till a man on the Warren bridge spoke to her. She was so overcome by the sense of her condition that she fainted, and had to be carried home by the police.

Southern.—Gilmore, who went to Richmond on a peace mission with Col. Jaquee, says that Davis told him that every white man who wasn't able to own a black man ought to be a slave himself, and if they (the poor whites) could be enslaved they would become a useful class of society.

—— The Richmond Examiner of the 17th says: "The restaurants and drinking saloons advanced their prices on Saturday, putting the rates a peg higher. The advance, they allege, is necessitated by the great rise in the prices of flour and provisions in the market. The bill of fare in saloons that formerly cost $10 now cost $15, and no drinks are to be had under $5. Perhaps it is well that the price of living has come to be defined at last. The thermometer can go no higher than 90; the currency may go to zero, but the charge cannot go above blood heat. This may as well be understood first as last."

—— As a significant proof of the scarcity of men in the South, the manager of the Richmond theatre advertises for "robust young women to fill the male rôles in the dramas."

—— W. F. H. Lee, of the rebel cavalry, has written a letter for the benefit of the rebel Congress on the subject of cavalry. He makes various suggestions for the improvement of this arm of the rebel service, acknowledging the superiority of the Union cavalry, and says: "Unless Congress takes the matter in hand and legislates more liberally on the subject, the enemy, next spring, will ride roughshod over the whole State."

—— The Richmond papers seem to be as much pleased at the fall of Charleston as we are. The Whig says it is a blessing in disguise, and the Enquirer says it will force the South to concentrate their troops.

Military.—Among the emigrants landed at Castle Garden, lately, by the steamship Great Western, from Liverpool, were 93 Englishmen who shipped for the avowed purpose of enlisting in the United States army. Immediately after reaching the Government dock, they visited Supervisor Blunt at his recruiting station, on the Battery grounds, and were examined. About 40 of them "passed muster," and were paid their bounties and sworn in.

—— Great guns cost something. A 10-inch Parrott gun costs $4,500; an 11-inch Rodman gun costs $6,500; a 15-inch Krupp's gun costs $29,400; a 12 inch Blakeley gun costs $35,000. The two latter are made of steel.

Naval.—The Boston Commercial Advertiser says: "Admiral Porter has just made a requisition on the Navy Department for 10 carboys of the best black ink."

Personal.—Mr. Dempster, the popular composer and singer, has arrived here from Europe.

—— Proudhon has left some postbumous works, among which are an Essay on Art, and a volume on "The Political Aptitude of the Working Classes."

—— Mr. Barnum recently introduced the famous Doctor Van Vleck to a select few at the Astor House. The Doctor is engaged at the Museum to expose the tricks of spiritualism.

—— Gen. Terry, the conqueror of Fort Fisher, is unmarried.

—— Wendell Phillips says of Edward Everett: "When I name Edward Everett, I desire to say that I name the cap-sheaf of American magnanimity for the last three years. I know of few men, in any age or language, who, at near 70 years of age, with such a career behind them, had the loftiness of spirit to stand before 20,000,000 of their countrymen and say, 'I was mistaken.' Such men are rare in any age, and certainly deserve fair credit for such a confession."

—— Ristori is making quite a sensation at Athens in her various characters, among which are Medea and Pyrrha.

—— On Tuesday, the 14th Feb., took place the third of the charming musical entertainments given this season by Madame C. Meare, of 224 Madison avenue. Most of the persons present probably anticipated listening to good schoolgirl music, but were most agreeably surprised by a rare musical treat. In her own department Madame Meare is unsurpassed as an instructress, and she selects such professors as have the power of imparting their knowledge, if we may judge by the taste with which the more difficult pieces of the evening were rendered. The pupils of Mr. Mills, as well as those of Signor Barilli, acquitted themselves in a style rarely attainable by young ladies. The music of the harp, accompanied by the voice, formed another delightful feature of this most charming soirée. We share the regret expressed by many that more pupils cannot avail themselves of the superior advantages of this far-famed institution. We trust that another season will find Madame Meare in a more spacious establishment, able to accommodate all who are desirous of receiving her instruction.

Obituary.—Gen. Winder, most infamous on account of his cruelties to the Union prisoners, died recently of apoplexy at Florence, S. C., aged 65 years.

—— Mrs. Conant, an authoress of great ability, died recently in Brooklyn, aged 50. She was as much esteemed for her womanly virtues as for her fine intellect.

—— Hon. Isaac Funk, State Senator of the Illinois Legislature, died last week. His wife did not survive him over three hours. Senator Funk will be remembered for his famous speech in the Legislature of 1863, in rebuke of the partisans who sought to embarrass the Government and get up a diversion in favor of the rebels.

—— David T. Fowler, Deputy County Clerk, died in this city, after a few days' illness, of pneumonia, in his 64th year. He was well-known to the New York politicians, and much respected by the bar of the city.

—— Capt. Stanton Shales, probably the last survivor of the battle of Lake Erie, in 1813, died in Columbus, Ohio, last week. He was an officer under Com. Perry.

—— Senator Hammond, of South Carolina, who gave the name of "Mudsills" to Northern working-men, is dead. Let the grave bury the memory of the wrong done to the hardy working-man.

—— A. M. Gorman, editor of the Spirit of the Age and of the Raleigh Daily Confederate, died in Raleigh on the 25th of January, aged 51 years.

—— The death of Sir James Sleigh in England is announced. He passed through the whole of the Peninsular campaign, was present at Waterloo, and served afterwards in India.

Accidents and Offences.—The little brig Vision, of one ton register, which sailed from New York in June last, has probably gone to the bottom, with her venturesome commander, Capt. Donovan, and his companion. They had but 60 days' provisions, and expected to make the voyage to Europe in about 40 days.

—— The New York Herald gives a list of 36 railroad accidents occurring from September 2d to November 17th, inclusive, resulting in the killing of 129 persons and the wounding of 355.

—— The Erie Gazette says that legal proceedings are about to be commenced against several persons in that city of foreign birth, on the charge of voting for many successive years without being naturalised.

Art, Science and Literature.—The people of Milan are going to raise a monument to Beccaria.

—— Leutze, the artist, has just finished a large picture of a scene in the "Merry Wives of Windsor." It represents Falstaff being carried out in a buck-basket.

—— M. Dumas, sen., has calculated that he has worked ten hours a day for 20 years, that he has received over 18,000,000 of francs, or nearly £730,000 sterling, and that he has kept employed in various ways on his works about 700 persons. The number of his volumes amounts to 400, and he has written 35 plays.

—— It is said that another autograph, in its most abbreviated form, has been found in a small Aldine edition of Ovid's "Metamorphoses," 1502. It is written "Wm. Shr." It seems jumping at conclusions to say this is the autograph of our great dramatist.

Foreign.—M. Matteuci, director of the police at Rome, has issued an edict prescribing certain days during the present carnival during which people may wear masquerade apparel, but without either masks, false noses or beards, or any other means of concealing the face.

—— At a club house in St. Petersburg, lately, an English traveller lost 360,000 roubles, equal to $300,000, at dominoes.

—— According to statistical tables recently published, there are in the Austrian empire 250,000 males entitled to the appellation of nobles. Hungary is down for 163,000; Galicia, 24,000; and Bohemia, 2,260, among whom are 14 princes, 172 counts and 80 barons.

—— The London Morning Star says, that while the Russian serfs before emancipation were calculated to have consumed about 18s. worth of cotton goods per head, that amount has already risen to £1 7s. per head over the 22,000,000 of emancipated peasantry.

Chit-Chat.—The first paragraph of the late Queen's Speech was verbally and literally identical with that delivered at the opening of the last session.

—— A new Hibernianism is mentioned by the Limerick Chronicle. It says: "A learned coroner, in a neighboring county, the other day, being asked how he accounted for the great mortality this year, exclaimed, 'I cannot tell; there are people dying this year that never died before!'"

ROMANTIC TRIAL IN SPAIN.

The Supreme Tribunal of Barcelona, in Spain, has been for some time past engaged in hearing a trial from a judgment given by an inferior court of that district in July, 1861, relative to the identity of a young man who claimed to be the son of a wealthy banker in Barcelona, dead some years ago. The circumstances of this strange affair may be briefly stated as follows:

The Marquis Don Francisco de Cara-Fontenallas, partner in the well-known banking firm of Lamberto Fontenallas, had two sons, Don Lamberto and Do Claudio, and one daughter, Donna Eulalia, married to he Marquis of Villamediana, residing on his extensive estates in the neighborhood of Madrid. In September, 1845, the younger son, Don Claudio, then 23 years of age, suddenly disappeared, and all efforts to find him proved fruitless. It was afterwards ascertained that he had been seized by the brigands, who carried him off to the mountains. Some days later, however, two or three letters were addressed to the Marquis by his son, stating that he was in the power of brigands, who refused to release him until a ransom of 1,000 ounces of gold should be paid. Perhaps the Marquis did not believe in the reality of the capture, and regarded it merely as an expedient adopted by his son to obtain a large sum of money. At all events, he did not send the gold demanded, and from that time nothing was heard of Don Claudio till May, 1860. Meanwhile the Marquis made a will, dated May, 1850, in which he expressed his wish that his property should not be divided between Don Lamberto and Donna Eulalia until his lost son had been found or his death satisfactorily proved.

When the Marquis died, some time after, Don Lamberto succeeded to the title, and at once divided his father's property between himself and his sister, the Marchioness de Villamediana. This prompt division of the property caused some scandal at the time, as the provisions of the will were generally known, but it was soon forgotten. In 1852, however, a man named Gomez, who had been arrested for robbery, gave the police a full account of the abduction of Don Claudio by the brigands, and the authorities determined on making a further investigation, when it was found that all the documents relating the circumstances had disappeared, with the exception of Don Claudio's two letters written while in the power of the brigands, which the deceased Marquis had given to a police magistrate in 1850.

The investigation, therefore, led to nothing; but nine years later, in 1861, Don Lamberto, the now Marquis, received a letter, dated May 15, and signed "Your brother, Don Claudio," stating that the writer had just arrived at Barcelona by the steamer Puerto Rico from Charlestown. Don Lamberto immediately sent an old clerk of the bank, named Don Francisco Juan Marti, to meet his brother. As soon as Marti set foot on the deck, he was accosted by Don Claudio, who called him by his name and shed tears of joy on meeting him. They went together to the Marquis Don Lamberto, who appeared to gladly recognise the young man as his brother Claudio, and instantly sent off a telegraphic despatch to his sister, the Marchioness of Villamediana, announcing the return of their brother.

On the following day Don Lamberto informed the Governor of Barcelona of his brother's arrival, and also formally acknowledged him as his brother in presence of a magistrate. Not the least doubt was entertained by anybody that the new comer was really Don Claudio, and he continued to be entertained by his brother as such till the 23d of May; but at two o'clock in the morning of that day he was arrested by the police in his brother's house, on the charge of being an impostor. The arrest was afterwards ascertained to have been made at the instance of the Marquis and Marchioness of Villamediana. Don Claudio was so overcome by this terrible accusation that he was instantly seized with a violent fever, and begged to have a glass of water, which was brought by one of the servants. He had no sooner drunk it than he exclaimed that he was poisoned. He was, nevertheless, carried off to prison, where antidotes were administered and he recovered, after three weeks illness, but still remained in the prison infirmary in a very weak state.

While he lay there a tailor and his wife, named Feliu, were brought to see him, and they declared the supposed Don Claudio to be their son Claudio, who had gone to Buenos Ayres in 1857, being then only 20 years of age; their son and daughter also recognised him as their brother. All four gave evidence on oath to this effect. Two other persons, however—Don Claudio's nurse and foster-brother—declared that he was really Don Claudio.

In his defence before the examining magistrate, Don Claudio produced four documents in which he was styled Don Claudio Fontenallas. The first was his commission as ensign in the army of Buenos Ayres, dated April, 1857, which proved that he could not be Claudio Feliu, as the latter sailed from Barcelona to Buenos Ayres late in February in that year, and therefore could not have arrived at the time. The second was a passport delivered to Don Claudio Fontenallas by the Spanish Consul at Rosario de Santa Fé; the third was a commission of sub-lieutenant of artillery, dated Buenos Ayres, July 22, 1858; and the fourth was the muster-roll of the men under his orders in a ship which he had commanded. These four documents, of such vital importance for the accused, were left in the possession of the examining magistrate, who, when the cause was tried, asserted that he had lost them. During the trial a great number of witnesses were examined, but their evidence was contradictory; some declaring that the prisoner was really Don Claudio Fontenallas, others as positively maintaining that he was the tailor's son.

The prisoner himself explained the manner of his capture, how one day he had escaped from the brigands while they were intoxicated, and made his way to Barcelona. He did not go home because, as his father had refused to pay the ransom, he concluded that the brigands had acted by his orders; but what could be his father's motive for giving such orders he did not know. He therefore went to America and remained there till 1861. When several old servants of the deceased marquis were examined, the prisoner reminded them of many circumstances which could hardly be known to any except the real Don Claudio; but the Marquise de Villamediana, though she had at first recognised the prisoner as her brother, afterwards declared herself convinced of the contrary, as she had found him unacquainted with many facts which her brother must have known.

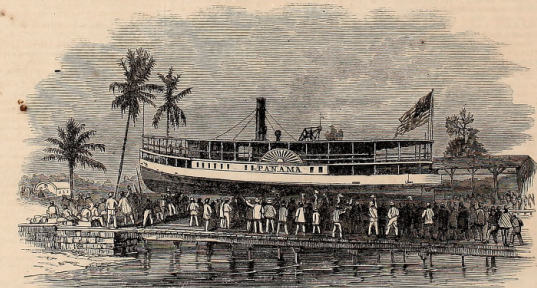
The result of the trial was that the Tribunal, which consisted of only one judge, declared that the prisoner was the son of Feliu, and condemned him to twelve years' hard labor. The Tribunal also ordered that twenty of the prisoner's witnesses should be prosecuted for perjury. The prisoner's counsel, M. Niviera, complained that the defence had not been free, that the judge had refused to hear several of his witnesses, and also that his demand for further inquiry in the Argentine Republic had been rejected, and concluded with protesting against the manner in which the previous examinations and the trial had been conducted. In consequence of these observations the judge committed him to prison for contempt of court.

The conviction was so general at Barcelona that the prisoner had been unfairly treated, that a subscription was opened in his favor, which produced a sum of 40,000 francs. Part of this sum was applied to relieve the prisoner's immediate necessities, and the rest was offered to M. Caso, a celebrated advocate of Madrid, to conduct the appeal against the above judgment. After long delays the appeal was made, and the Supreme Court of Barcelona has given its decision, substantially confirming the judgment, but reducing the sentence of hard labor from twelve years to two. The prisoner's counsel was reprimanded by the court, and thirteen witnesses were declared guilty of perjury.

SCENE AT SAVANNAH, GA.—BRANDING HORSES CAPTURED DURING SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

CAPTURE OF FORT ANDERSON.

THE last remaining defence of Wilmington has fallen. Fort Anderson was evacuated by the rebels on the night of the 18th of Feb., and next morning at daybreak our troops entered the deserted stronghold and hoisted the old flag once again. Since then Wilmington has surrendered, and thus in one week three nests of treason have been taken by the Union arms. Admiral Porter in his dispatch says:



"I have the honor to report the surrender or evacuation of Fort Anderson. Gen. Schofield advanced from Smithville, with 8,000 men, on the 17th.

"At the same time I attacked the works by water, placing the monitor Montauk close to the works, enfilading them with the Pawnaxet, Lenape, Unadilla and Pequot, the tide and wind not allowing more vessels to get under fire. The fort answered pretty briskly, but quieted down by sunset.

"On the 18th, at 8 o'clock, I moved up closer, with the Montauk leading, followed by the Mackinaw, Huron, Sassacus, Pontoosuc, Manatoago, Lenape, Unadilla, Pawtuxet, Osceola, Shawmut, Seneca, Nyack, Chippewa and Little Ada, and kept up a heavy fire throughout the day until late in the afternoon.

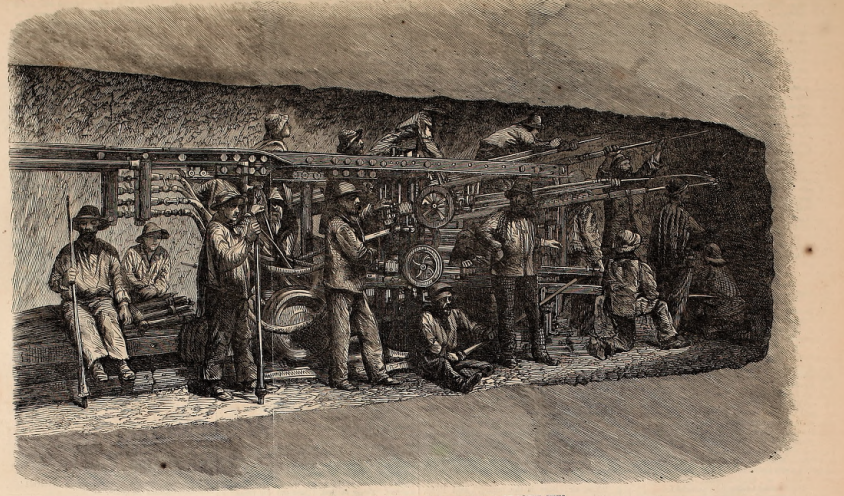
"The enemy's batteries were silenced by three o'clock, though we kept up fire until dark. We also fired through the night. In the meantime Gen. Schofield was working around to get in the rear of the rebels and cut them off.

"The latter did not wait for the army to surround them, but left in the night, taking five or six pieces of light artillery with them, and everything else of any value. At daylight some of our troops that were near by went in and hoisted the flag on the ramparts, when the firing ceased from the mortars.

LAUNCH OF THE PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY'S NEW STEAMER "PANAMA," AT PANAMA, NEW GRANADA, JAN. 28.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.

VIEW OF FORT ANDERSON, ON THE WEST BANK OF CAPE FEAR RIVER, N. C., CAPTURED BY THE U. S. TROOPS, FEB. 19.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, JOSEPH BECKER.

"There were ten heavy guns in the fort and a quantity of ammunition.



"We lost not three killed and five wounded."

In addition to the above account we have to mention a little ruse by Lieut. Cushing, already favorably known for his ingenuity and daring. It appears that he constructed a mock monitor, so closely resembling one of these vessels that no difference could be detected at a distance of 100 yards. On Saturday night, the 18th, at about 11 o'clock, this vessel was taken up to within about 400 yards of the fort and set adrift. As there was a strong flood tide she moved up the river and passed the fort as if under slow steam. At this time the army had worked two-thirds the distance around and in rear of the fort, and the rebels, no doubt, thinking their communication would be cut off both by land and water, hastily escaped by the only avenue open to them, leaving their guns unspiked, their magazines unexploded, etc.

LAUNCH OF THE PANAMA R.R. CO.'S STEAMER PANAMA.

We give, from a photograph by a Panama artist, a view of the launch of the Panama Railway Company's new steamer Panama, at Panama, on the 28th of January last. This steamer is designed to communicate between the California steamers and the railway terminus, and will be a vast improvement on the small and exposed vessels through which communication has hitherto been kept up. Every California traveller will rejoice to know that the most disagreeable link in his chain of journey will henceforth be passed over more rapidly and pleasantly. The Panama was built at Panama, and is, we believe, the largest vessel ever launched there. She owes her existence to the enterprise and perseverance of Mr. Nelson, residing in Panama, the railway company's ablest and most obliging officer.

TUNNELING THE ALPS—MACHINE USED IN DRILLING THROUGH MOUNT CENIS.

THE FALL OF CHARLESTON.

February 18th, 1865.

BY ADA VROOMAN

THANK God! she has fallen,
The proud wicked One!
Thank God, she is lying,
All helpless and dying—
Her dark race is run.

Quench doubly in sackcloth
The light of her eyes,
Let the whole earth rejoice,
With a loud happy voice,
That she never shall rise.

She nursed the foul Treason
She called into birth,
And sent Death's ghast shadow,
Over city and meadow,
To desolate earth.

On the earth that once echoed
To Washington's tread!
She ranged brother 'gainst brother,
Sire and son fought each other—
Thank God she is dead.

Woe! woe! to the city,
The wrath of the Lord
Hath found her and smote her,
Hath struck her and taught her
The strength of His sword.

The smoke of her burning
Shall rise from afar,
The bound ones shall kneel,
And old Tyranny reel,
At this red bolt of war.

The pale, anxious mother
Smiles sweet through her tears
"She has fallen, the queen,
And my brave boy, I ween,
Has fought with his peers!"

The maid at her lattice
Sighs softly to see:
"Not long, oh, my own,
Shall thy love be alone,
Thou art coming to me!"

The wife wakes her babe,
With a face all love-glorious:
"Oh, baby," she cries,
"Open wide thy sweet eyes;
Thy father's victorious!"

The children in joy,
Whisper low to each other:
"The war is near done,
Soon the soldiers will come,
With father and brother!"

O God, hear the children!
Let them not ask in vain,
Bring the boys to their mothers,
To the maidens their lovers,
Bring balm for our pain.

Thou art seen in all this,
O Wondrous to save!
That the Cradle of crime
Should be through all time
Its pitiful Grave.

THE GREAT PERCIVAL DIAMOND.

HOW IT WAS LOST AND HOW IT WAS FOUND.

I SIGHED as I laid down the old parchment with its crabbed black letters. My grandfather had made a true copy, for here in the original list were the very words over which I had, as a boy, so often pondered, and which, as a man, I had come thousands of miles to verify.

"Item. One great diamond of exceeding brilliancy, and of the bigness of a hazelnut. It is reckoned to weigh over XX (twenty) carats, and was brought home from the Indys by Sir Reginald de Percyvalle in the reign of King Richard, commonly known as the Lion Heart."

To this was appended a marginal note, written in another hand, and dated 1750, some seventy-five years later than the preceding:

"The diamond aforesaid, brought home by the founder of our family, and described by Sir Mordaunt Percyvall, my grandfather, a man curious in such matters, has disappeared from the family treasure-chest in some manner unknown. It has never been seen since the unhappy night when——"

Here succeeded an impatient dash of the pen, but the information refused by the broken sentence was supplied by the courteous English cousin under whose roof I stood.

"I suppose," said he, "my great-grandfather could not bear to put down in words the incident to which he refers. Upon that—unhappy night

THE EBONY BOX.

—Rose Percival, his only daughter, fled from her father's roof with the groom who had been accustomed to attend her daily ride, and no trace of her after fate has ever been discovered, although her two brothers, your grandfather and mine, used every means in their power to find and rescue her from the ignoble fate which she had chosen. The proud old father did nothing, said little, but died the next year, leaving my grandfather to succeed to the estate and title, while yours, with his slender portion as a younger son, emigrated, and established himself in America."

"But with a pardonable weakness," added I, "copied out this list of plate, jewellery, and other family heirlooms to carry with him, and was found in his old age, as I have heard, of relating the splendors of Kingcroft and the old Percivals."

"It was but natural that he should cherish the memory since he was forced to leave the reality," said my cousin. "You do not remember him yourself, then?"

"Not at all. He died when I was very young, as also did my father, and for a mere lad I was considered and treated as the head of the family. Among the papers placed in my charge I found the copy of this old list, and my imagination was at once excited by the description of the marvellous lost diamond. I have always been peculiarly attracted by gems, and this must have been so fine a one. Later, I concluded that my grandfather, anxious to enhance the family grandeur, had taken some liberties with the original document, and when I decided to come abroad one of my principal objects was to visit Kingcroft, and request of you permission to examine both the list which I have just perused and the valuables which it describes."

DISCOVERY OF THE DIAMOND.

"I'm pleased with any motive which has brought you to England and to Kingcroft," said the courteous Sir Reginald. "And you find your grandfather's copy correct?"

"Perfectly, I am happy to say. But the diamond—can we do nothing towards its discovery?"

"Nothing, I fear. Our recreant ancestress probably took it with her in lieu of the portion which she did not care to claim openly, and it must long since have been disposed of, either entire, to some wealthy collector (in which case, however, we should have been likely to hear of it), or divided into smaller and less conspicuous gems. And now will you walk through the picture gallery before dinner?"

After a few more pleasant days I said farewell to Kingcroft and my cousin Reginald, its fortunate possessor, and resumed my tour, which occupied about three years longer, at the end of which period I found myself one morning in America, and what was still more charming, in the arms of a prettier woman than I had seen since my departure, but whom I should hardly have recognised for my little sister Laura, had not her rapturous kisses and embraces satisfied me of her identity.

"And so, puss, you have grown up, fallen in love, and become a matron of America, since I bid you good-bye some four years since," said I, at length.

"Yes, indeed, and something more, Mr. Hal! I have a surprise—a most delicious surprise for you," laughed the merry rogue, running to the bell.

"Send Ruby down," said she to the servant who answered the summons.

"Ruby—what's Ruby?" asked I, but Laura only kissed me again and laughed more than ever, so I laughed too, and kissed her, the darling little sister, and was still doing it when she sprang away towards the door, clapping her hands and shrieking:

"Look, look, Hal! Uncle Hal!"

I did look and beheld a small red infant, wrapped in much flannel and cambric, lying in the arms of a young girl, to whose rare and delicate beauty I instinctively bowed as I approached to examine her charge. She returned my salutation, coloring deeply as she did so, and I could not forbear to notice that the flush was of that rare sea-shell glow, instead of the common purplish rose-tint.

"Can she be a servant?" thought I.

But Laura, who had waited nearly half a minute for my burst of rapture, exclaimed, impatiently:

"Well! What do you say? Isn't he a love? Is he more like Walter or me? Isn't the expression about his mouth very like your own? Guess what we are going to call him!"

"Dearest child, wait till I recover from the shock of delight caused by his existence before you demand speech from me. He is an angel—finer than all the pictured cherubs of Raphael and Correggio which I saw abroad—finer even than the infant Prince Alfred of England, before whom I had the honor of bowing at Windsor Palace—finer than ever baby was, or ever baby can be. As for his particular resemblance to anything—anybody, I mean—I am not yet sufficiently intimate with him to detect it; but I don't doubt he will in time become as handsome as his mama, or perhaps—who can foresee?—as his mama's brother Harry. At present his complexion is a little warm, but——"

"Oh, he is going to be very fair every one says. He is a little redder now than usual, don't you think so, Ruby?"

"He has just waked up, ma'am. I think he is a little flushed," said the young girl, who I found was Ruby, gravely examining the little puckered atom of a face, which now began to twist and writhe in a manner significant of an approaching storm.

"But his name—you haven't guessed his name!"

"To be sure," said I, gravely considering. "Now what can it possibly be? Not Mordecai, I suppose, or Ahasuerus, or Nebuchadnezzar, or"—

"Stop, now, you provoking creature! I won't have such names suggested, even in fun. What should you say to—Walter?"

"I should say that he was named after his father."

"Well, then, he isn't," retorted Laura. "What should you say to Percival?"

"Percival Edgecombe, eh? Well, I say that it is a very good name, and I graciously give my consent."

"But what should you say to Harry Percival Edgecombe, you stupid, stupid boy?" screamed my little sister, throwing her arms about my neck in an extasy of delight at the success of her surprise.

"What, named after me! Is it possible, you funny little Loto?" exclaimed I, returning the kisses with interest.

"Yes, indeed, and indeed! And he isn't christened yet, and you are to stand godfather——"

"And leave him all my fortune?" asked I, merrily.

"No," said my sister, naively; "you must marry and have children, if you are to inherit that."

"We shall see about that, madam; and meantime, nurse, you must take good care of my little godson," said I, slipping a sovereign into the baby's blanket, for I could not bring myself to place it in the hand of this grave and quiet girl.

"There, take him upstairs, Ruby, and I will come to him," said Laura, hurriedly, for the threatened storm was beginning to rise triumphant over all the nurse's attempts to charm it into calm.

"Wait a minute or two, Harry," added my sister, "and I will be down again. My poor little man is hungry."

So I promenaded the drawing-room, thinking what a dear little woman my sister had become, and how pleasant it was to be once more at home, until the door reopened and Ruby appeared, with the warm glow very predominant upon her oval cheeks.

"Mrs. Edgecombe would be happy to see you in the nursery, sir, if you will be so kind," said she, adding hurriedly, as I was passing out of the door which she held open,

"And here is something, sir, which you dropped just now into Master Harry's blanket."

"It was meant for you, Ruby; it is customary for a child's godfather to make a little present to the nurse," said I, kindly, and was passing on, but Ruby, making a step in advance, again extended her hand before me, saying in a beseeching murmur:

"Oh, do please take it; indeed I don't want it; I cannot take it."

"Did Mrs. Edgecombe bid you return it?" asked I, in considerable surprise at her earnestness.

"I didn't tell her of it; I should have been ashamed to let her know that any one thought I would take it," murmured Ruby.

"But, you foolish child," said I, turning back to look again at the pure, pale face of this strange servant-maid, "it is nothing wrong, nothing of which either you or I need be ashamed. When my nephew is christened I shall give you something at any rate, it is part of the ceremony, and it would be absurd for you to object—so why not take it now? You are Harry's nurse, are you not?"

Perhaps my last question was put somewhat superciliously, for I began to feel really annoyed. Here was a pretty girl, more than that—a girl of uncommon beauty—striking, yet purely classic, but she was a servant in my sister's house, and as such I desire to treat her; but the girl herself opposed this treatment, and every moment made me feel it more impossible to retain the stand which I had taken towards her, and so, man-like, I began to be angry with the woman who asserted herself, and asked sharply:

"You are Harry's nurse, are you not?"

Ruby raised her hitherto downcast eyes, and looked full in mine, while the ready blush rose again to cheek and brow.

"Yes, sir," said she, with quiet pride, "I am Mrs. Edgecombe's servant, and take my wages from her, but I do not need and will not have money that I never earned."

"Impertinent!" thought I to myself, but only said coldly, "I will thank you to show me the way to the nursery."

"Yes, sir; here is the money," said Ruby, quietly.

I took the sovereign; I could not help it, and followed the proud little form of "Mrs. Edgecombe's servant" up the stairs, feeling a thrill of joy at seeing her, in the darkest corner, hastily brush her hand across her eyes.

"She is sorry now that she didn't take it," I tried to think, but I knew well enough that it was false and mean.

The next moment Ruby opened the nursery door and stepped back to allow me to enter first.

"Come in, Hal," said the important little matron within, speaking from the depths of the low chair where she sat, the baby asleep upon her lap. "I sent for you up here because I couldn't bear to leave him—he looks so lovely in his sleep, and to tell the truth I sit here almost altogether when I am alone. You don't mind, do you, dear?"

"Mind, my darling! Henceforth it shall be my proudest privilege to be admitted to these sacred precincts, and you must never shut me out when I may with any propriety come in."

"Oh, that is very nice of you, Hal; but you always were a love! I know you will enjoy the baby however, and isn't this a pretty room?"

"Beautiful—more like a boudoir than a nursery," said I, smiling as I glanced around.

"In fact I have taken more pains with it than with all the rest of the house," said the young mother fondly. "I think it so important that a child's first impressions should be of beauty."

"Harry's will be, certainly," said I. "Everything here is beautiful, beautiful exceedingly," and I bowed to my sister, and glanced at Ruby's pure, pensive profile, now bent over some needlework. "Doubtless, too," continued I, "Master Edgecombe already discriminates the difference between these cherubs of Correggio, or that exquisite little St. John, and the penny portraits of Saucy Sally, and the Ballroom Belle, whose red cheeks and blue gowns stared at me from the print-shop in the next street."

"If he can't now, he will at some time, I suppose," said Madam Laura, rather sharply, and then, afraid lest her feather bullet might have pierced my heart, hastily laid the baby in his cradle, and gave me a squeeze and kiss, saying a the same time:

"What do you know about babies or nurseries, you dear, darling, silly old pet? Come, it is almost four o'clock; we will have round the carriage and go down town, to fetch Walter home to dinner—you haven't seen him yet?"

"No; I came straight here to see little Loto, the first of anybody."

"That was just like you. Ruby, take good care of the baby."

"Yes, ma'am," said Ruby, without raising her eyes.

"What a strange girl that nursemaid of yours seems to be," said I, half pettishly, as we rolled along towards down town.

"Strange! I don't think she's strange, though she's certainly a very uncommon girl to find at service. I can't help treating her so much more like a companion—friend even—than a servant, that any other girl would take advantage of it."

"Where did you find her? Has she lived with any one but you?"

"No, indeed; and I don't believe she ever will. She has the most amusing little fund of quiet pride, and I believe really stays with me from love and not from interest. They are poor, too; she was the daughter of a very respectable farmer near Violet Hill—our little place in the country you know. When Harry was born I wanted a young girl to help the nurse, and Mrs. Snyders, our old housekeeper, mentioned Ruby Jocelyn. Her father had died a little while before, and left Ruby and her mother very poor indeed, so poor that Mrs. Snyders thought the widow would be glad to let Ruby come to me. So I engaged her, and last month the nurse, horrid thing, got—well, she drank, you know—and of course I sent her away, and Ruby takes all the care of Harry, except what I do myself. It isn't the kind of thing for her at all, or wouldn't be with any one who did not feel towards her just as I do, but I take pains to keep her from being annoyed by the other servants. She sleeps and eats with Mrs. Snyders, who has always known them, and, as I said, I talk with her as if she were a friend almost, in fact I don't think she realises at all that she is a servant."

"That is absurd," said I, almost angrily. "What is to become of her if you encourage such notions in her head? You unfit her for her station, without being able to give her your own."

"I don't know that," said Laura, warmly. "A very little training, a few hints even, and a little more self-confidence would give her the manners of a perfect lady. Then it would be very easy to educate and accomplish her, she is so quick, and I have almost determined when Harry shall be a little older, to adopt her as a sister, and as you say, raise her to our own station. She would be an ornament to it."

"And what is to become of her then?" asked I, crossly. "You won't expect to marry her to a gentleman? I think nothing so odious as these unequal alliances, they always end miserably."

"Oh, I shan't ask you to marry her," laughed Laura, gaily; "but I don't doubt somebody will be very glad to, and somebody who will be a gentleman too. But, mercy! how I have chattered away the time. Here we are at the head of the wharf; I will wait in the carriage, and you may go down and fetch Walter."

Several months passed quietly on, during which I became thoroughly domesticated in the house of my brother-in-law, who, with rare conjugal sympathy, not only shared Loto's love for me, but loved her the better for it.

One of the pleasantest rooms in the house had been appropriated to my use, and in it I set up the books, the pictures, the bronzes and the marbles; in fact, all the little articles of vertu which a young man of dilettante taste and sufficient means would naturally collect in a three years' tour of Europe. Fairly settled, I laid out for myself a profound scheme of study, including a research into the most ancient Egyptian hieroglyph, and a comparison of the Sanscrit and Chaldaic languages. I arranged my books and arranged my hours, but the proper frame of mind would not be arranged, and hours slipped away while, leaning lazily back in my study chair, I slowly drew in the fragrant breath of my chibouk and dreamed. Dreamed sometimes of Rose Percival and her possible fate: sometimes of that lost diamond which my warlike ancestor had brought with him from Palestine, whither it had, perhaps, returned. Sometimes I fancied that, perhaps, his restless spirit had reclaimed and hid it, and once I remember wondering if I might not acquire such skill in cabalistic lore as to bring the old Crusader from his tomb in Kingcroft chapel and force the knowledge from him, as he, perhaps, had forced the jewel from its unhappy Oriental possessor.

Tired of dreaming, yet too unsettled for study, I would wander into the nursery, where I generally found Laura cooing to her baby, or watching his slumbers, while Ruby sat apart bending over her needlework. Throwing myself into the always offered seat beside her, I would entertain my little sister with long accounts of my journeyings, and the wonders of the far-off world, to which she listened, sometimes with interest, sometimes with loving abstraction, while her thoughts were engrossed by Master Harry's last new trick, or the intricacies of her embroidery. But even in this case I went remorselessly on, for without once looking towards her, I saw full well, nor could withstand, the delicate flattery of Ruby's varying color and uneven breath, and the silent tears which brimmed and overflowed from Ruby's downcast eyes, and the tremulous fingers which forgot their busy craft, while I told of the night when, lost among the Alps, I sank breathless and dying in the new fallen snow, and had said good-bye to earth and life, when my trusty Fritz, led by a mountain guide, found and rescued me.

Other times I read to Laura, and slily watched the drooping, averted face of my most attentive auditor. In fact, I gradually became aware that my silent study of this silent little maid—for after the first day we rarely exchanged a word—possessed a fascination which had never been afforded by the dimmest hieroglyph or deepest buried Sanscrit root.

Returning to my room one day, I stood long contemplating an exquisite female head and bust, the work of one of the old masters, Titian, as I aver, though it is disputed, which I had bought for a few scudi at Florence, confident that there was something worth having under the tawdry peasant girl, who smirked upon the face of the picture. Taking it straight to Rome, I placed it in the hands of a cleaner in whom I had full confidence, and watched him hour after hour, as he patiently removed the vulgar disguise which so long had hidden the patrician beauty of the head beneath.

I stood and looked at it as I have said, and murmured half aloud: "Yes, it is very fascinating to wipe off the peasant girl and uncover the noble features beneath, but to what end? What is it I am doing, and what sort of life am I living? It must all end; and will it leave the child as happy, or me as honorable as if it had never begun? But pshaw, nonsense, Harry Percival, thou art growing a coxcomb and a fool; because an inexperienced girl listens to your egotistical adventures with interest, must she be breaking her heart for you? Or cannot you trust yourself in the presence of a pretty nursemaid for fear you should fall in love with her? You who have travelled the world around and come back heart whole, it is nonsense, ridiculous nonsense. I will never give it another thought, but just go on as if my sister's child's nurse were the oldest, ugliest and most stupid of her sisterhood."

A few more months elapsed—months to me of mental strife, irritation and suffering unspeakable. I grew moody, silent and capricious; at war with myself and all about me, and became so altered both in mental and bodily condition, that I constantly found my sister's soft eyes seeking mine with an anxious love and sad reproach which I could not long resist—for Laura and I alone were left alive of all our father's house—and we loved each other well. So, one soft morning in June, when we were settled at Violet Hill, I asked my sister to ride with me, and as our horses noiselessly paced along a green forest lane, I told her, in a few brief words, the determination to which my long struggle had brought me. I ceased, and waited for the answer, but no answer came, and I looked up with mute inquiry. Laura's face was pale as death, and quick tears were raining down her cheeks.

"Loto!" exclaimed I reproachfully.

"Forgive me, Harry, I cannot bear to grieve you, but we had hoped such things from you—you are all—have all—that could be hoped for in a husband by the proudest lady in the land. I have never wished that you should marry the dearest of my friends, because you were so much too good for her, and now to think of your choosing Ruby—oh, Harry!" And my sister covered her face with both her hands, and sobbed aloud.

I groaned in bitterness of spirit, but now that I had shaped my thoughts into words, I saw its strength and depth as I had never done before, and Laura's tears, and Laura's words, could wring my heart, but never shake its deep resolve.

"Can you mention one fault of character, one meanness, one weakness even, that you have ever found in her?" asked I gloomily. "She has lived in your constant presence for now more than a year, and you women have sharp eyes for each other's faults, Laura."

"No, I cannot," said my honest little sister. "I wish Harry, for your sake, that I could say yes; but in justice to Ruby, I must say no."

"Then you have no reason for your tears and sorrow, but her misfortune in being poor and of humble parentage?" asked I sternly.

"She is a servant, and you are—a Percival!" murmured Laura doggedly.

"Loto, I am ashamed of you; I thought you above such weakness!" exclaimed I, angry and discouraged at hearing the fiend of pride, whom I had fought down in my own heart, thus boldly defying me from the lips of my gentle sister.

"Oh, Harry! don't speak so to me! You never did before in all your life, and I shall hate the girl instead of loving her, if she is to bring strife between us."

"Dearest Loto, forgive me. I am mad, and hardly know what I say or do. I have suffered so these last few months."

"I know you have, dear. I have seen it, but never guessed the cause; marry whom you will, Harry, only be happy, and love your little sister. I see now that this, which is so sudden to me, has been long and well considered by you, and I can fancy the struggle through which you have passed. Surely I need not be more careful of my brother's dignity than he is himself—he the proudest of the proud Percivals, as they call us."

"And you will receive her as a sister, Loto?"

"More than that, Hal. Go you away for a year to Europe, or where you will, and leave Ruby with me. I will engage that, before you return, I will so shape and polish your little native jewel, that the brilliant setting in which you would place her shall seem no more than fitting for her."

"Thank you, darling—a thousand times thank you! Now your own warm heart breaks through the fog of prejudice and custom in which we both have wandered for so long, and what a blessed balm you large-souled woman can pour into a torn heart when it so pleases you."

Laura did not answer, nor did I look towards her, while I gaily added:

"And you will fashion my jewel to its setting! Who knows but the great lost diamond of the Percivals has, by some mysterious transmutation, grown into this bright Ruby, in whom is restored to us Percivals the long-sought jewel of our house."

"Perhaps," said Laura absently, adding in a hesitating voice, "of course you must see Mrs. Jocelyn."

"Certainly—to-morrow. Will you go with me?"

"If you wish it, dear, although I have never seen her. But, oh, Harry! have you considered well? Suppose the mother is very vulgar?"

"I have considered well, darling, and we will not torment ourselves with suppositions till after our visit of to-morrow."

The next morning, again on horseback, my sister and I found our way to the quaint little Dutch farmhouse, far away upon a lonely road, to which Ruby had, with silent wonder, directed her mistress. The door was opened to us by a pale, pensive woman, looking as her neighbors would say "as if she had seen trouble," who replied to our inquiry that she was Mrs. Jocelyn, and invited us to enter and seat ourselves.

We complied, and were shown into a neat and modest, but very humble little parlor, where Laura announced her own name and position towards Ruby; then with faltering voice mentioned my name, and hastily left the room. Mrs. Jocelyn, with an expression of alarm, was about to follow her, but I interposed.

"Don't disturb yourself, madam, my sister will be better by herself, she is somewhat agitated on account of my business here this morning. concerns your daughter, Mrs. Jocelyn."

"Deary me, sir," said the mother, a faint tinge of red creeping up to her pale cheek. "There's no trouble about Ruby I hope and pray."

"None in the world, madam, unless you should make it. I love Ruby, and would take her as my wife—have I your consent?"

"Yes, sir! Didn't Mrs. Edgecombe say so on her brother?"

"Yes, madam, my name is Harry Percival—a name which, as I have said, is the most earnest desire to honor and love Ruby Jocelyn."

"Dear me, sir," said the widow again, the tears beginning to steal down her withered cheeks; she wiped them away, and said:

"You must excuse me, Mr. Percival, but I been so used to bad fortune that when good fortune comes I cry just the same. It is a great honor to Ruby and to me—more than either of us deserves, though I don't know after all as I should say that, for if the child is as she was, she is good enough and pretty enough to be a king's wife."

"That is right, Mrs. Jocelyn," said I, more warmly, for the little touch of maternal pride pleased me. "And I rather you should think Ruby too good for me than to fancy me too good for her. My only advantages are of family and fortune, and no thanks to it do those inferior to certain other qualities, in which Ruby excels not only me but almost everybody else."

"She is a good child, sir," said the mother, pleased to hear her darling praised, "and I don't believe you'll ever be sorry, sir, that you chose her, instead of both. Leastways," added the widow earnestly, and rising her sad eyes to mine, "if you ever should be sorry, and it wasn't Ruby's fault, but the fault of her condition, I hope you'll try to hide it from her all you can, for the child has a tender heart—a heart that would break, and never complain, if she was treated harshly, sir."

"My dear madam, for what do you take me? Ruby's heart and mine feel a pang from which mine can shield it, and if I have made up my mind to ask her in marriage, knowing her condition, it is because I think, once she is my wife, I should change towards her on that account. I understand from my sister that the poor boy who lived in Hanover so many generations, and have always been respected here."

"Yes, sir, they are a good family—for farmer folks that is—they never was up for gentry, any more than the Rubys. I was a Ruby, sir, from Oldtown."

"I have heard the name as belonging to the substantial yeomanry of the county," said I, not displeased at the little family pride peeping through his widowhood demeanor.

"Yes, sir, I believe they are well considered generally, although of course they never were like the Percivals and such families. Hypocrites to say though," added Mrs. Jocelyn with a little bewitching laugh, "that her mother was a lowly daughter than myself, but we never made as much account of her talk about that."

"What did she say was her mother's maiden name?" asked me, now interested.

"She never said, and I don't believe she knew anything more, than what grandmother said when she was a child. She died young, sir, and my mother, who was her only child, was only a little girl; but mother used to say she remembered well how grandmother looked, when she called her to the bedside and kissed her, and gave her a little black box, telling her to keep it always, and never part with it, except to her own eldest child. And then mother would show us the box, which was child come to me with her other goods, for though I was mother her eldest child by her only child, I was the only one of them all that lived to close her eyes. I've been a deal of trouble, sir, you must know."

"But the box—will you show me the box, Mrs. Jocelyn?" asked I so eagerly that the widow looked up in much surprise from the deep drawer where had begun to rummage.

"Why, sir, it's nothing but a little black wooden box with some of tin let into it—sort of a plaything I reckon. But here it is, such as it is, and if you or Ruby care to keep it I'm sure you are heartily welcome. There was nothing in it when grandmother give it to mother, and there's nothing in it now."

So saying, Mrs. Jocelyn placed in my hand a small round box, which a very slight examination convinced me was of ebony, richly inlaid with silver—a work very originally, although now defaced by time, and one very unlikely to have belonged to Mrs. Jocelyn's grandmother had she been in Mrs. Jocelyn's own station.

It was empty, as I had been warned, but inside the lid I discovered some minute characters faintly scratched with a needle or other sharp-like instrument. I did not attempt to decipher them, but pinning the box in my pocket, said:

"I should like, if you will permit me, Mrs. Jocelyn, to take the box with me, and Ruby shall tell you to-morrow if I find it of any value."

"Dear me, sir, you're welcome to the box if you fancy it's of no use to you, and I shall be very right glad to see Ruby, without minding what brings her."

I hid my future mother-in-law a hasty good-morning, and hardly waiting for her response passed out to the little front garden, where I found Laura skip wiping her eyes and vehemently emulating at a great peony. I put her upon her horse with a mercy kiss which seemed to shock her comfortably, and we sauntered home at a nice respectable pace.

"Do you wish to speak to Ruby?" asked Laura, with a smile which she intended for a cheerful one, as I took her from the saddle.

"No, not dear. I am going to my own room, and wish to be undisturbed till dinner time."

"Very well, Harry," said my sister, and I bounded up the stairs, entered my chamber, and locking the door behind me, drew the box from my pocket, and sat down close beside the window to examine it. It was, as I have said, a round box, some two inches in diameter, inlaid upon the lid and around the sides with silver, in a rich arabesque pattern. I first examined this silver tracery, hoping to discover some ink like initials or crest among its fanciful involutions, but without success; taking off the cover, which merely slid on without lince or spring, I laid the box upon the table while I scrutinized the minute characters within the lid—these I found to be letters evidently, but I could make nothing further of them, and arranging the powerful microscope I had always at command, I placed it over the letters, and looked anxiously through the glass.

Good heavens! Am I awake? The letters danced before my eyes, reeled and stumbled, but always rearranged themselves into the blessed name of Ruby, which I had hardly dared hope to see—

Rose Perceval, her box. 1748.

I read the faint legend again and again, until I could trace the letters with the naked eye before I could fully believe my own good fortune, but at last having it down, I took up the box at which hitherto I had hardly glanced. Now, however, I at once noticed a very significant circumstance—namely that the depth of the inside was occupied by the bottom, which appeared, at first sight, to be a solid block of ebony, but which I determined to be a hollow.

"It is not heavy enough to be solid, or light enough to be hollow," muttered I. "Of course there is some false bottom or drawer."

I said no more—thought no more—but spilled the whole power of my mind to the solution of the problem within my grasp. I found the base of the box I had already noticed a row of little star-shaped silver ornaments, and to these I first turned my attention, but in vain, each was separately—no result. I tried to pull them towards me—they would not stir. I tried to slide each one up or down, right or left—the same result. Slowly, reluctantly. With a cry of joy I turned the box and pierced it upon the palm of my hand—the false bottom, I felt sure, was the key to a grand solution. The entire aperture thus disclosed was filled with soft, light wool, packed tightly in. Hastily, fearfully I pressed the wool upon its surface, and felt a round, hard substance beneath it. A shivering thrill of nervous pain ran through my body, and blinding me for a time while I quietly seated myself and locked at it. There it lay—the secret of a hundred years, within my grasp, within my power. Between me and a little flake of wool between my hand and the object which four generations of my house had vainly sought, there existed only the frail base of the box. At this moment this maddening delight of anticipation, than which no reality could be a sweeter? Not I! Neglecting the wool, which, still shutting on the cover, I placed the little casket in my bosom, arranged my toilet, and went to dinner.

My sister had invited the whole young ladies of the neighborhood, and rather prim in general, but I do not believe a prouder assemblage ever was shrubbed. I wished and hoped that in receiving my arm another my breast, that I might feel the pressure of Ruby's little box upon my heart. Laura's instructions were fixed on, because not to my senses. The dear child told me afterwards that she had been to Ruby's room, and was going about on terrible alternative! had been dividing too much wine.

The ladies left the room. I muttered an excuse to my brother-in-law, and left it also—the next moment I was locked into my chamber.

No pause, no hesitation, in opening the false bottom I tore out the wool—shook it into my hand—and there it lay. There lay the diamond of Reginald de Percival, the crusader soldier, and almost the bigness of a hazelnut," as my grandfather's great-grandfather had described it. It was set in the old-fashioned "rose cut," and was closed by a plate of gold, upon which were engraved the well-known arms of my family. Beneath, in the bottom of the box, lay a folded piece of paper, yellow and broken with age: carefully unfolding it, I oppreached the window, and read in the well-formed characters of a girlish hand these few sad words:

"My name is Rose Perceval Duncan. I am fourteen years old to-day, and my mother is very sicker. I am the only daughter of Gaston Percival, of Rincecroft, in Surrey, England, but I left my home to be married to a man who is a soldier. I have taken the great diamond from my father's treasure chest, not, as God knows full well, that I covet anything for myself, but that when my children known and taken home at some future time by their mother's house, and though poor foolish Rose Perceval will be dead and will be forgotten, the great Perceval diamond shall live and be remembered, and shall gain a welcome for her those that I must leave behind. Pray for me."

I read the simple words, and through them I saw the whole sad story of a wayward girl's noble ancestress. The girlish dream of romance—the sad awakening to a sordid reality—the want of money—the heartlessness of most, which led her to confide her treasure to a child too young to be trusted with its full value, rather than to her unnatural parents—her early death! My eyes were dim, as I refolded with tender care the little yellow paper, and laid it with the jewel again in the hiding place.

Waiting until the rumbling of wheels assured me that the guests had departed, I sought my sister, and said:

"Now, Laura, let me see Ruby."

"Go to my little sewing-room and I will send her to you," said the dear girl, kissing me with quivering lips.

A few moments after Ruby stood before me, silent and quiet as was her wont, but with a startled look in her gray eyes which did not diminish as I handed her a chair, and producing the little box opened the secret spring and showed her the contents.

"This little casket and what it holds are yours, Ruby," said I. "An inheritance from a long and proud line of ancestors—your ancestors and mine."

I paused, watching the charming color that began, wave after wave, to flood the classic cheek and brow, the white throat even, grow bold with wonder, were steadily raised to mine, but Ruby still was silent, and I went on to tell her of Rose Percival and the great diamond, finishing by placing the jewel and the folded paper in her hand. She glanced at the gem, and read the paper attentively, but the dark roses style shown her cheek. Then holding out the diamond to me, she said, with a little smile:

"Half the treasure belongs to the finder you said one day. I will keep the box and the paper, and you will take the diamond."

"Not so, Ruby. All is mine or all is yours—will you give me all, cousin?"

"Simply if you wish it," said the child, somewhat surprised as my avarice but holding out the box, the paper and the jewel.

I took them, and the little hands which held them.

"It is not yet enough," said I. "I will not have the diamond unless I may have the Ruby too. Shall I have the Ruby, little one?"

She did not answer, save with a wild cry, half joy, half despair, and throwing away her hands impressed them close, close upon the glowing face down which quick tears were streaming, while the whole slender figure shook as if with some fit. Then, and following the habit of a hundred years, hid itself beneath the folds of a muslin curtain.

"Ruby said at last, and how I replied, are not a part of the present narrative, but the next day she went alone to see her mother, carrying with her, at my request, the so suddenly important little box.

On her return at night, however, she brought it with her, saying that her mother fully agreed with her that it never belonged both of right and of propriety to me, and that they would never look upon it in any other light.

Two years later after, Mrs. Jocelyn being amply provided for, and Ruby already hard at work with a governess who labored under my sister's superintendence, I was married, carrying with me the great diamond, which I felt compelled in honor to offer at least to the head of the house whence it had been abstracted.

My cousin Reginald, however, was firm in his refusal to profit by my discovery.

"The law," said he, "and it is the law that locks into the family, but our ancestress had undoubtedly a right to her portion, and since she chose to intrust it to a child too young to take it as she did, how can we deprive her descendants of their heritage? If she present possessor becomes your wife, I will consider the case altered, and though you will give it to your eldest daughter as a dowry, and I will send my eldest son to marry her."

We laughed as we parted, but more impossible things have come to pass. The great-diamond has been reset, as the central stone in a necklace of alternate rubies and pearls, which I am now carrying home across the ocean, as my marriage present to the fair young bride who waits for me beneath the glorious West.

THE ANGELS IN THE HOUSE.

THREE pairs of dimpled arms, as white as snow,
Hold me in soft embrace;
Three little cheeks, like velvet peaches soft,
Were placed against my face.

Three pairs of tiny eyes, so clear, so deep,
Look trustingly into mine;
Three pairs of lips kissed me a sweet "good-night,"
Three little forms from heaven.

Ah! it is well that "little ones" should love us!
Ah! it is well for us to be taught by them
To know that once our blessed Saviour bade them
Bring "little ones" to him.

And said he not "Of such is heaven," and blessed them,
And held them to his breast?
It is not sweet to know that when they leave us,
"Tis then they go to rest?

And yes, ye tiny angels of my house,
Three hearts crossed in mine,
How I would shield them as the Lord should say,
"Those angels are not thine?"

GIRLS.

IF there is one question of taste upon which all the world—the world of men, we mean—will agree, it is that of girls.

The world is a rapid very tendency, knowing that it carries with it a roughness, an aroma of the pole faced, scant shield and hard work, and so, of the weary eyed stitcher, laboring deep into the night for the pittance that will keep soul and body in one. It is there we find girls, that will admit to the title, not the gay butterflies who flit upon Broadway in fine weather, and yawn away the hours in bed, and yet there are those the best of the same mould—sad girls. Let us appeal to the feminine portion of them to be any more beautiful sunny in nature than a fair young girl, fifteen or sixteen years. She is an instrument giving out to the lightest touch the most exquisite harmony; she is a chameleon, capable of the most wondrous changes, a volume of never ending interest.

What can be of more worthy seeking than the friendship of a young girl, and yet how few seek it really with a view to big-brotherhood. Not that a big brother is always a desirable possession for a young girl, simply because big brothers, endued with worldly selfishness, do not think it often worth while to sacrifice some of the attentions they pay to others, and bestow them upon sisters, who should have their perpetual care and watchfulness. It is well for a girl who has a big brother that he is wise enough to see this, and to know how to really care for his sister; in such cases he need have no fear of passing through perils and temptations that beset them on every hand. If he possesses this sense, he can be her guardian and teach her where to be very cautious in accepting, and where to be very careful in rejecting. How little is this charge understood even by parents. How few take the really sensible and manly view of the matter—that a girl turning out upon the world is innocent, and that she does not even understand the meaning of an immoral sentiment or act. Do we boast that we send a soldier forth to battle unarmed and unshaped as to the enemy's tactics or force of approach? The safety of a girl depends upon her being taught the science of danger and the consequences of allowing it to overcome her. What safety there is in a dancer who will throw herself upon the fleecy of men, or upon the protection which the law has provided for her amusement? Such happiness ever grew out of a marriage enforced?

There is something very beautiful in the idea of the contented happiness of a girl who, after every conceivable occupation in the cities, toiling from morning till night, and suffering all the physical evils, and worse than evils, that ever grind uncomplainingly on, virtuous and good, though they are utterly denied all those little nothings supposed to be vital to their commonsense life. We better realize this in some of the eastern towns, which almost seem to be colonies of girls, rudely and unceremoniously thrown upon the world to gain, after five years of saving, get together enough to see them out upon the matrimonial journey with comfort, decency, and such other chick-necks as may be necessary.

It is also a sad thing to go into some of the cheap boarding-houses of these workers. We call unchimely boarding-houses, where everything must be counted down to the closest point, and the fare is unsubstantial. Not that it is not decently nurtured and fed than a man, must live for perhaps $1 75 or $2 per week. And yet while we have the greatest sympathy for the girls in this country, how little is it to that of Great Britain, that kingdom over the sea, ruled by Victoria. Of the population of that very large dominion to be the only spot of freedom on the face of the earth. There Parliament has undertaken to do what is unsuccessfully by the world in the position of working girls, to prevent their being worked too young, or too many hours, and to regulate their pay. It is but a few years since some revelations were made in the House of Commons that struck all the world with horror. The children employed in the mines of Wales, from twelve to twenty was taken, when cases were shown where the hands of a shop were obliged to work thirty consecutive hours, with only a few minutes, until they dropped senseless at their labor.

Let us all think of these girls as our sisters or daughters, let us remember the anecdote told of Mr. Oastler, the great English philanthropist, who was walking with a friend, when he spoke to Sir Robert's seat, to implore his assistance in carrying through a measure for the relief of factory operatives, but Sir Robert angrily set out against state interference, until at last the subject was dropped, and Sir Robert took Mr. O—— to his private library. In a few hours after every child they came to a beautiful picture by Landseer, in front of which they stopped, and Mr. O—— asked what it was.

"My daughter," was the baronet's answer.

Mr. O—— was still for a moment, and then burst out with

"Oh! Sir Robert, think of it, and she might have been a factory girl. Yes! even with all her beauty, and luxury and love, a factory girl!"

The earnestness of the reformer conquered, and from that moment Sir Robert was one of the firmest advocates of Mr. Oastler's measures.

THE CROSS was an instrument of torture and death among many nations, and in several, even before the Christian era, it was used as a sacred symbol. There were several kinds of crosses. The simplest of all was the upright stake or stuff of a tree, sometimes attached to the top of a perpendicular one, like the letter T, and sometimes crossing it like Latin cross, being a transverse beam crossing an upright at the top. The St. Andrew's cross is in the form of the letter X, while the Greek cross was so constructed that the two beams were of the same length, and thus made the four arms of equal length. The Maltese cross is only a variation of the Greek cross.

The comparative table of the foreign trade of France for the first 11 months of 1864 shows that the exports are in excess of those of the corresponding time of 1863. The exports for the first 11 months of the last four years were, for 1861, 2,336,370,000fr.; for 1862, 2,194,119,000fr.; for 1863, 2,410,000,000fr.; for 1864, 2,600,000,000fr. For the exports of French merchandise the increase is much more considerable. Their official value for the same periods as above were—1861, 1,737,462,000fr.; 1862, 1,622,220,000fr.; 1863, 1,800,000,000fr.; 1864, 2,000,641,000fr. The augmentation is about 200,000,000 francs, or about 11 per cent, over the year 1863, and for 1864 show an increase of 50 per cent. over those of 1861.

ACCORDING to a calculation recently made, says the Monitor, there exists in the whole world a group 72,000,000 of Jews, of whom 4,000,000 in Europe, especially in Russia, where there are 1,250,000, the number in Austria is 850,000, in Prussia 300,000, and in the rest of Germany, 100,000. At Frankfort-on-the-Main there is one Jew to Christians; in Bavaria and Norway only one to 600. France contains 50,000; Italy, 35,000; Holland, 80,000; Turkey, 300,000. The fact is that in this country alone the Jews are comparatively most numerous in all Europe, England—and England—their number is diminishing, whilst elsewhere it is increasing.

PROF. HUXLEY, in a recent discussion on craniology, said that it is one of the most unfortunate facts of humanity, and that the first thing which naturally occurred to man was not to love his neighbor, but to kill him.

COMTE, in a letter to Charles V., in illustration of the advanced state of society among the Aztecs of Mexico, said that "they hug in it strode like civilized people."

THE NAMELESS MONUMENT.

A level stone that Time hath fretted,
Bitten often, and ground away,
Till now there is left but a dark, damp slab,
To catch sometimes a wandering ray.
No name, no effigy, date, or badge;
No smear of gilding, or bloom of paint;
No chevron, or fess, or shred of mail;
No mournful angel, or watchful saint.

All, all gone! The pride and pomp,
The dead man's vanity, all defaced.
Time, like a cruel, envious churl,
Both title and epitaph has erased;
And now the poor corpse, abbot or knight,
Martyr or king, hath a nameless tomb,
A mere flat slab of refuse stone,
To guard his bones till the day of doom.

MARGARET; OR, LOST AND FOUND.

I love that name, reader mine. I don't know that you do, but just repeat it over two or three times to yourself. Margaret—Margaret—is it not musical, is it not soft and sweet, with a ring that echoes pleasantly in the two r's? I always loved it from the first time I ever heard it, which was one day when I was about five years of age. The first day that I entered school I heard one of the little girls call her next neighbor Margaret, and the name went to my heart. How strange that it should, and yet how natural.

A failure in business, when I was about seventeen, caused the removal of my father and mother to a small residence they had in the country, about fifty miles from the large city where we had lived as long as I could remember.

It was a beautiful little cottage that received us, instead of the splendid mansion, brown-stone front, that had been our home, and I was foolish enough to prefer the cottage, from the window of which I looked out upon a boundless expanse of green fields, waving grain, tall trees and gloriously blue sky.

One Sabbath I went to church alone; on my return, as I walked along the shady path and drank in the noonday beauty of the summer sky, and felt the exquisite stillness of the hour, I met a woman—I am wrong, a lady—I am right in making the distinction, for this woman was no common one, a lady, a thorough lady from the inmost core of the heart out. I knew it, and experienced the knowledge in the very air that surrounded her.

This was Margaret.

Margaret would have attracted attention anywhere, "in hall or bower, in church or mart," and as we met we walked slowly, and each of us observed the other with more than mere attention till we had passed.

I saw a woman about thirty-five years of age, pale, thin, with noble features, straight and perfect, as if carved from marble; a sad, almost weeping mouth, and eyes of singular and most observable beauty, brilliance and softness. The hair, dark, with many white threads shining soberly through it, was plainly parted on the brow and folded behind the ears.

Her attire was simple in the extreme. The bonnet of black straw, close, with a ribbon of the same hue, bound across it, and strings of the same tying it. The dress a black silk, an old black silk evidently, but well kept as it was well worn, and the shawl a plain black cashmere.

Over all breathed an air of such perfect neatness as pleased, satisfied, delighted the eye.

She looked at me, not piercingly; it was impossible to conceive a piercing glance coming from those exquisitely soft, brilliant eyes, but the look read me through and through, kind, gently, but still thoroughly, as if she saw every thought of my heart laid bare before her, and read it as she would have done the clearest type.

It was natural that I should wonder who she was. Natural that I should think who is this graceful, elegant, beautiful and woefully sad-looking woman? How comes she here? What can she be doing alone—for she evidently is alone? Something about her asserts it, and she is, from her dress, poor. Accordingly I asked myself questions very much the same as I have now said, but as is usual in such cases, I obtained no very satisfactory reply.

I remarked to mama that I had met this woman, and that I could in no way explain to myself the unaccountable interest that her appearance excited in me.

My lady mother looked at me strangely for a moment, then laughed and called me a "fanciful little thing," and so the subject dropped. But I could not forget her so easily; I thought of her, I dreamed of her, I looked for her, and I met her again. Something she had in her hand—I don't know what, for I did not observe—fell from her. I would not have thought of doing it for another, but I stepped forward, took it up and returned it to her.

She thanked me with such a sweet, sad smile, that tears came to my eyes; there was so much of chastened sorrow and resignation in it, and then we passed each other, though there was a cord in my heart that seemed fastened to hers and pulled me back towards her, so that I could with difficulty continue on my way, instead of turning back and speaking to her as I felt so drawn to do.

Some weeks passed, and I did not see her any more during that time. I felt uneasy, I wondered was anything the matter, had anything happened, had she left that part of the country, would I never see her again?

A pain of acute sharpness shot through me with dagger-edged keenness when I thought that I might never see her any more, and I went and sat down alone in my room, and cried bitterly.

Something occurred then to direct my attention from the subject, in some degree.

An old friend of my father's, whom he had not seen for many years, discovered where we lived, and came to pay us a visit.

He was a handsome, gentlemanlike man, of about forty years of age, most fascinating in address and pleasing in manners.

When I was presented to him he started violently, colored to his temples, and then becoming deadly pale looked at me fixedly for some moments, till, seeing that I was becoming embarrassed, he stepped forward and whispered:

"My dear little girl," he said, frankly, and with the pleasantest of voices, "you will pardon me I know, when I explain that your appearance brought very vividly to mind another such as you that I knew and loved long ago."

Then taking my head between both his hands, he drew it a little backward, stooped slightly, and kissed me gently on the brow.

"Thus I salute the daughter of my old friend," he said.

We became friends rapidly, and it was wonderful to me the strange love with which this man inspired me.

Not a passionate love, not a lover's love, not the love of a woman's heart for the first time awakened, but a respectful, deferential, deep affection such as I felt for my parents, but greater than I felt for either of them. Mr. Norwood must have divined my feelings; he took every means in his power to increase my affection.

Never were his manners so fascinating as towards me—never was his voice so sweetly gentle as when addressing me.

My father and mother looked on approvingly.

"My dear," said mama, "you cannot do better. He is more than double your age, it is true, but still a young man. He loves you—that is very evident; he is rich, a member of the best society, a perfect gentleman, and though he has been married before, from that very reason more likely to adore and spoil to her heart's content a young and pretty wife, as you are, or I should say, will be, my darling."

"Mr. Norwood married before?" was all that I could say.

"Yes, dear; a widower. Take my word for it, though I cannot speak from experience, being my dear husband's first wife, widowers make the very best kind of husbands."

"Mr. Norwood a widower?" I ejaculated, not yet recovered from the surprise.

"Yes, is there anything so very extraordinary in that?"

"Nothing so very extraordinary in the bare fact, mama, but strange that I should never have known it till now."

"What? Jealous? Is it possible?" said mama, gaily.

"No, indeed," I protested, indignantly.

"Now if Mr. Norwood could see you, Katie, your conquest would be complete. You look brilliant when you're angry."

"Nonsense, mama," I said, half laughing, and half provoked. I wonder when the time was that a compliment would not smooth a ruffled temper.

"Jealous, as I live!" and my handsome mother laughed in almost girlish glee.

"I am not; don't imagine that I have any such feeling as you suppose towards Mr. Norwood, mama; I like him more as a father than any other way, and I never will like him otherwise."

Mama laughed.

"One father is sufficient, covetous little girl."

At this moment came a voice from among the lilac bushes out in front of the verandah that we both knew very well.

"Miss Katie," it said.

I colored in spite of myself, but it was from vexation, and mama laughed again.

"Go, my dear," she said.

I held back, and felt very much inclined to rebel.

"Don't be foolish, Katie," said mama, with an attempt at sternness.

"Miss Katie," came again from among the lilac bushes, and the matter was decided, by the half-pleading, half-commanding voice.

I went.

I found Mr. Norwood seated on a bench beside one of the bushes, and a bunch of the most beautiful fullblown lilacs in his hand.

"Where have you been hiding yourself all day?"

I said I had'nt been hiding.

"But you have, though, little runaway; and when I called you this morning you would not come—what was that for?"

"I didn't hear you, Mr. Norwood."

"You didn't hear me—now is that the truth, the whole truth, et cetera?"

"It is the truth, the whole truth, et cetera."

"Very well. You have that excuse no longer. You hear me now, don't you?"

"Distinctly."

"Very well; understand me to say, then, that I wish you to come over here and sit on this bench beside me."

I was standing about a yard and a half distant from him. I moved over and sat down upon the bench.

"Now I am going to see what kind of a little queen—May queen, I mean, you never would do for any other kind—you will make."

He began winding the lilacs into a wreath, and when it was completed put it upon my head, and I was "crowned withal."

"Did I say you would make no other kind of a queen, my Katie, than a queen of May?"

"You did, sir."

"Then I was wrong."

"And how, Mr. Norwood?"

"Cannot you guess?"

"Perhaps so. Would I make a royal one?"

"The queen of hearts is ever royal."

I felt my cheeks crimson, and I could not meet his eyes. He took my hands within both of his.

"My Kate, my little Katie, you are the queen of my heart. Accept the sovereignty, won't you?"

"Impossible, Mr. Norwood."

"Impossible? And why impossible, Katie?"

"Because, sir, I cannot."

"But, Katie, I love you dearly."

"So do not I love you dearly, Mr. Norwood."

"Then, indeed, I have been mistaken greatly," and he released my hand; "I thought you cared for me, Miss Katie."

"And so I do, sir, very much indeed, more than my father and mother, though I cannot account for it, but not with that other and greater love. Pray, sir, pardon me; it grieves me to grieve you," for he was looking very sad, reader, "but, indeed, I never can feel towards you other than I now do."

"You cannot forbid me to hope that I may yet induce you to regard my suit more favorably."

"But I can; I forbid you most peremptorily; I lay my sovereign commands upon you that you that you don't hope for one instant that I will ever regard you other than I do," I said, gaily.

"At least you cannot prevent my indulging such a hope."

"I can assure you, Mr. Norwood, that it is utterly, utterly useless."

I rose to leave him.

"Don't go, Miss Katie: don't let me frighten you away; that is the very last thing I desire to do."

"Pardon me; I must leave you for awhile. Adieu."

I hurried away, for I did not wish the scene to be any farther prolonged. That I might not meet Mr. Norwood at dinner, I excused myself from that meal, and putting on my hat and a light shawl, I went out for a walk.

I had not proceeded half a mile when in turning a bend of the road I met Margaret, and for a moment we stood face to face. She spoke:

"I have wished and prayed to see you," she said, "and if I had been longer denied I fear I would have gone to Mr. Bankton's and asked for you."

I was astonished, and hardly knew how to reply. I said:

"Madam, you are almost sure of finding me at home at any time."

"It was with that impression that I was making up my mind to call upon you, but thank God! I see you now. Oh, Katie, Katie, child of my love and of my heart! Did any voice, till that moment unheard, cry out in your soul, when you first saw me?"

"Yes," I answered promptly, struck by the strangeness of the question, which seemed to say that the speaker had read my inmost thoughts and feelings.

"Then I was not mistaken."

She folded me in her arms, and strained me close to her bosom, and bending over me she kissed me many times, with such warmth of love as never had rained down upon my lips, and eyes, and brow before; and oh! what a joy, deep, trembling, overpowering, taking away my very breath with its intensity, shot through me when I felt myself closed in her arms, her heart beating against mine, her kisses raining down upon my face.

"To you this is strange; this is inexplicable, this extraordinary love that we feel, the one for the other," she said, releasing me a little, and holding me back to look in my face.

"Yes, madam."

"Will it ever be explained to you, my Katie? Perhaps so, wait and pray."

She released me entirely as she spoke, and taking my hands in hers, held them tightly, looking me straight in the eyes.

"My darling, God bless you, and keep you for ever in his care," she said, and passed on, turned the bend in the road, and was lost to my sight, leaving me thoroughly amazed.

It was about a week subsequent that, not having seen Margaret in the interim, I walked again in the same direction, with the intense hope of meeting her, and wondering till my brain ached asking questions of itself, and searching for replies, what mysterious tie it was that bound this woman to me, and me to her.

I passed the bend in the road, but I did not meet her. Instead, to my amazement, and somewhat to my consternation, I found myself facing Mr. Norwood, who, it appeared, had also gone out for a walk around the country.

"Miss Katie, I am glad to meet you."

He turned back as he spoke, and, drawing my arm within his, we walked on.

"I am glad to meet you," he said again, and because I knew not what to return for answer I thanked him.

"You have thought upon the subject we conversed upon a week since?" he questioned.

"I have not, Mr. Norwood."

"I had thought you would at least have thought the matter over, Miss Katie."

"It required no thinking over, Mr. Norwood. The only reply I can ever make to the proposal you were so kind as to honor me with is that which I returned a week ago. Pray do not speak upon the subject any more."

He did not answer.

We walked on for some little distance before he spoke again. Then he said:

"And you will not be my wife, Katie Bankton?"

"Mr. Norwood, never."

"God forbid that she should give any other reply to that question from your lips. God bless you, my child, for what you have said."

"Margaret!"

He dropped my arm as if it had been a serpent and stung him, and stood facing her.

She was deadly pale, nor was he less so, and both were terribly agitated.

I looked from one to the other, and asked myself what in Heaven's name did this mean?

And while I did so I thought of the suddenness of her appearance, and wondered where she came from, but that was speedily answered. A clump of pine bushes was just before us; she had stepped out from behind them and confronted us.

When the first overpowering surprise was passed, Mr. Norwood knelt down before this much injured woman, and looking at her with mingled terror and entreaty, spoke:

"Margaret, Margaret! Is it Margaret, or her spirit, come to chide me?"

"It is Margaret herself in the flesh, and no other."

"Oh, can you ever forgive me, Margaret—my wife—my deeply, deeply injured wife?"

"I was injured, Edward, for I was most true."

"I know it, my saint, you were heavenly true; and, therefore, your innocence and greater goodness can forgive my blind fury."

"I forgive you, Edward. Rise."

"And our child, Margaret—our darling? Oh, believe me I have searched the world for you both, but they told me you were both dead. Where is our child—our daughter? Not dead—not dead?"

"Our daughter stands there!" and she opened her arms and clasped me to her heart, while I, unable to comprehend or even to think, mutely returned the embrace, only hearing from my father a cry of terrible agony.

"My God! my God! I have loved my daughter! not Heaven, be not just with me; else should I be whipped with the rod of Thy wrath, but be merciful and forgive me. I did not love her. Oh, no! It was Nature's own voice crying out, and I, fool!—fool!—I did not understand her pure language. My wife—my daughter—forgive me?"

I could only join my mother in pronouncing a full and complete pardon, hardly knowing what I pardoned.

That night, when all was explained to my heretofore father and mother, and my true parents claimed me as their child, I heard these few words that made the mystery clear pass between my own father and mother:

"Yes, Edward, on that terrible night when you drove me away from you I left my baby, though it almost broke my heart, upon the doorstep of Mr. Bankton's house, knowing that Mrs. Bankton had lost an infant of the same age only two days previously, and I was not mistaken in supposing that any little forsaken one would be cared for even as their own, for I had no means to support it."

"My own Margaret—my injured and most forgiving wife!"

And so it comes that I have two fathers and two mothers. God bless them all!

ONLY A CLOD.

CHAPTER XIII.—CAUGHT IN THE TOILS.

Francis Tredethlyn spent the bright summer Sunday afternoon and evening at the Cedars. Mr. Hillary generally filled his house with company on the day of rest; and hard-working commercial magnates and lazy West End loungers were alike glad to spend their Sabbath amongst the flowerbeds and trellised walks, under the shadow of black spreading cedars, or on the terrace by the river. The merchant's house was only another Star and Garter, where the menu was always irreproachable, and where one escaped that little bugbear so common to the close of all social entertainments, and known by the vulgar name of "Bill." Mr. Tredethlyn found the house full of strangers, and Miss Hillary very difficult of approach. He was not allowed to feel embarrassed, however, for Julia Desmond always happened to be in his neighborhood, and he found her society as charming as on the previous occasion. She was so very handsome, and there was really something so bewildering about her dark eyes and white teeth, and fluent talk upon every possible subject, that the young man—who had never been accustomed to the society of well-educated women—may be forgiven if he admired her. He admired her, but not as he admired Maude Hillary. No thrill of half-fearful rapture stirred his pulses as he stood by Julia's side upon the moonlit terrace, looking down at the rippling water, darkened by the tremulous shadows of the trees; but the faintest flutter of Maude's airy flounces stirred his soul like a burst of music.

But she was only a beautiful, far-away creature, who never could have any part in his destiny. He acknowledged this in a half-despairing way, and then resigned himself to look at her only now and then from a distance, and to behold her always surrounded by those elegant amber-whiskered loungers, whose admiration of her loveliness never made them awkward in her presence; who could approach her without suffering from a sudden determination of blood to the head; who could hover near her without trampling half a yard of her lace flounce to destruction under the savage tread of a clumsy foot.

"Those fellows are fit to talk to her," he thought. "They've been brought up to it, I suppose; but I'm better out of her way, for even if she speaks to me I make a fool of myself somehow, and feel as if I couldn't answer her. I get on better with Miss Desmond; she's so kind, and she doesn't seem to mind my being awkward and stupid."

Yes, Miss Desmond was very kind to the simple-hearted Cornishman. So kind is Madame Aracnna to a big, blundering, bluebottle fly that hovers ignorantly about the net she has spread for him. Julia had angled very patiently for the last two years in the great matrimonial fisheries, and had brought several fish to land, only to lose her hook and leave them to gasp and perish on the bank when she discovered their quality. But now, for the first time, she knew she had a prey worthy her skill and patience. She had taken good care to ascertain that Francis Tredethlyn's thirty thousand a-year was no mere figment of a gossip's brain, and she set herself deliberately to work to win this prize so newly offered for competition in the matrimonial markets. Mr. Hillary interested himself in the young man's fortunes, and gave him some advice about the management of some of his uncle Oliver's numerous investments. This, of course, necessitated interviews at the merchant's offices in Moorgate street, and no interview ever came to a close until Francis had received hospitable Mr. Hillary's invitation to "run down" to Twickenham.

The young man seemed always running down to the Cedars. He slept there sometimes, in a pretty chintz-curtained chamber, all rosebuds and maplewood, and from whose jessamine-festooned windows he looked out upon the river—the perpetual river, now shimmering in the moonlight, now twinkling and glancing in the sunshine, but always "a thing of beauty and a joy" for the people who dwell upon its banks.

Yes, he was always riding down to the Cedars. He had departed very little from his simple habits, but he had bought a couple of horses at Tattersall's, such horses as a man who has been used to ride across wild moorland districts without saddle or stirrups from his earliest boyhood knows how to choose. He kept the horses at livery near his hotel, and he hired a smart young groom to attend to them, and even to ride behind him on occasions.

Miss Hillary grew accustomed to the young man's presence, and greeted him kindly when he came; but then she had so many friends, such enthusiastic female adorers in crisp muslins, who found the millionaire's daughter the dearest darling in the world, and were always eager to pour some new confidence into her willing ears. She had so many friends, so many admirers, that Francis Tredethlyn always found her more or less difficult of approach. And, in the mean while, there was Miss Desmond perpetually smiling upon him, and talking to him, and listening to him.

So things went on very pleasantly for Mr. Tredethlyn until one day his eyes were very suddenly opened to a fact that well-nigh overpowered him. He was lounging on the terrace one sunny afternoon, and, for a wonder, Julia Desmond was not by his side. She had been summoned in the midst of a conclave of pretty girls holding solemn discussion with Maude Hillary on the lawn. Francis was looking down at the water, as it was his habit to do, and thinking. He was leaning against the balustrade of the terrace, all amongst the foliage which had been so bright when he had first come to the Cedars, but which was brown and withered now; he was watching the dead leaves slowly drifting in the wind and dropping one by one into the water, and he was thinking of his cousin Susan. Nothing had yet come of his search for her. Perhaps he had left the matter too much in the hands of his lawyers, trusting to their legal acumen for the unravelment of the tangled skein. It may be that he had been a little too much at the Cedars, absorbed in the delights of a new existence. This afternoon, watching the drifting leaves upon the river, the gold and crimson tints of autumn on the woodland and the hillside, Francis Tredethlyn remembered how the time had slipped by him, and how little nearer he was to the discovery of Susan Tredethlyn's fate than when he had listened to Martha's story in the dreary Cornish grange, and had sworn to go to the end of the world in search of his cousin. There was some feeling of remorse in his mind as he thought of the past three months, the idle days in that luxurious riverside retreat, the billiard-playing and cigar-smoking, the pleasant rides to and fro in the dewy evenings, with genial, gentlemanlike companions, who thought him a good fellow, and very rarely laughed at his ignorant simplicity.

He was roused from his reverie now by one of these young men, Mr. Montagu Somerset, of the War Office, the scion of a noble house, the presumptive heir to nothing a year, and one of the most hopelessly devoted of Maude Hillary's adorers.

"Why, Tredethlyn," exclaimed the young man, without removing a gigantic cigar from between his lips, "how dismally you're staring at that water! It looks as if you were contemplating felo de se, b'Jove. What's the row, old boy? and how do you happen to be alone? Where's the fiancée?"

"I—I was thinking of some family matters, not very pleasant ones," Mr. Tredethlyn answered, simply.

"But where's the future?"

"The what?"

"The future—Mrs. Francis Tredethlyn that is to be—the Desmond. Why, has the lovely Julia deserted her Frank? Why, you dear, simple old baby, how you blush! Is it a crime to be in love with a handsome girl? I only wish your young affections had fixed themselves on one of my five sisters—all most amiable girls, but without so much as a spoonful of what our lively neighbors call potage."

Francis Tredethlyn stared aghast at the young official.

"Why, you don't suppose—you don't think that I—that Miss Desmond—that—"

"You know those silversmiths on the Boulevards—no, you don't know Paris, by-the-bye—well, dear boy, there are Parisian silversmiths who make a great display in their shop windows by means of a concatenation of table-spoons and a strong flare of gas; but I doubt if in all Paris there was ever such a notorious case of spoons as the present, and I don't blame you, my dear Tredethlyn. If I were not Alexander I would be the other person. If I were not madly and hopelessly in love with blue-eyed Maude, I should fling myself at the feet of dark-eyed Julia; such teeth, and such a generally regal tournure, with thirty thousand a year, ought to make a sensation. Frank, I congratulate you! Bless you, my boy, and be happy!" Mr. Somerset wrung his friend's hand with effusion.

"But, my dear Somerset—but, upon my word and honor," cried Mr. Tredethlyn, in extreme terror and perplexity, "Miss Desmond has been very kind to me, and feeling myself out of place here, I've been very grateful for her kindness; but, as I am an honest man, not one word has ever passed between us upon any but the commonest subjects, and I am sure that neither she nor I have the slightest idea of—"

"Oh, you haven't, eh?" asked Montagu Somerset, taking his cigar from his mouth, and staring at it in a contemplative manner, as he knocked away the ash; "never mind about Miss Desmond; you haven't any idea of making her mistress of yourself and your property, real and personal, eh? You admire her very much, and are very grateful to her for being civil to you, and so on, but you have no idea of making her an offer of marriage?"

"No more than I have of making you such an offer."

"Then, in that case," replied Mr. Somerset, deliberately, "all I have to say is to this effect—look out for squalls; when you are coasting on a shore renowned for its quicksands, you'd better beware of any strange light you may see ahead, for the illumination generally means danger. When you meet with such a girl as the Desmond, don't trifle with her; of course it's very pleasant to ride, and drive, and play billiards, and loiter through a summer month or so with a handsome girl, meaning nothing serious all the time; and it is to be done with impunity, if you're careful in your selection of the young lady. But I don't think Julia Desmond is exactly the sort of girl you should try it on with. There are men in our place, apoplectic old fogies in starched neckcloths and no end of waistcoat, who knew the Desmond's father; he was a south of Ireland man and a notorious duellist. They say Julia inherits his eyes and teeth."

"But you don't mean to say that I've done Miss Desmond any wrong?" cried Francis. "How should I be otherwise than grateful to her when she was kind to me, and set me at my ease somehow, and made me feel a little less like an Ojibbeway Indian suddenly let loose amongst fashionable people? How should I imagine that she would think of me except as—as Miss Hillary thinks of me? His voice grew low, and an inexpressible change came over his whole manner as he mentioned Maude Hillary's name. "They know my history, and that this time last year I was a private in a foot regiment, with nothing higher to hope for than an extra stripe upon my sleeve."

"Miss Hillary is one person, and Miss Desmond is another," Mr. Somerset replied, with just the least suspicion of hauteur. "The lovely Julia's face is her fortune, you know, dear boy. You ask me if you've been wrong; and I tell you frankly, as a gentleman, that I think you have. A man can't be exclusive in his attentions to a woman without other people perceiving the fact, and forming their own conclusions thereupon. I know every one who comes here regards the matter as settled, and I heard Maude say the other day that she thought you a very good fellow—she didn't say fellow—and would be delighted to see her dear Julia so pleasantly established."

"Did she say that?" cried Francis, with a dusky blush kindling under his dark skin; "did she speak well of me? And if—if she should think I have done Miss Desmond some kind of wrong by usurping her society and setting people talking about us—if she should think me mean or base—"

Montagu Somerset interrupted Mr. Tredethlyn by a long whistle.

"Oh, the wind's in that quarter, is it?" he exclaimed, "you're down in that list; then in that case I've nothing more to say. The river flows at your feet, my dear friend, and I dare say there's a rope for sale somewhere in the villages of Twickenham or Isleworth."

The young man sauntered away, leaving Francis with his arms folded on the balustrade, and his face darker than it had been, even when he had thought remorsefully of his missing cousin.

Miss Desmond had not made such very bad use of her time. With consummate tact she had contrived to detain Francis Tredethlyn at her side in all those pleasant walks, and drives, and boating excursions, which made up a great part of life at the Cedars; and it had seemed that the young man, of his own option, devoted himself to Colonel Desmond's daughter. Julia had been clever enough to set the simple Cornishman entirely at his ease in her presence, and having done that, all the rest followed naturally enough. It was to Miss Desmond that Francis Tredethlyn confided his opinions upon every subject; it was to Miss Desmond that he applied for enlightenment when his ignorance fenced him about with cloud and darkness, and seemed to shut him out from the people round him. When the visitors at the Cedars were busy in the animated discussion of some new book whose name Francis had never heard, and whose contents would have been utterly beyond his untrained understanding, Julia would explain to him the nature of the volume, simplifying the subject with a dexterity that was all her own, but never humiliating her companion by any display of her own superiority. If art was the subject of discussion, Julia insidiously demonstrated to the Cornishman the merits and demerits of any given picture; so Francis Tredethlyn had been considerably benefited by three months of intimacy with a handsome and accomplished woman, and he began to feel something like a well-disposed Maori who had been admitted into familiar intercourse with a family of friendly settlers.

But all this time, in spite of handsome, dark-eyed Julia's kindness, in spite of all the benefits to be derived from intimate relations with such agreeable people as the guests who were always to be found at Twickenham, the one charm that had held the young man constant to the Cedars, like some spell-bound knight in a fairy story, who cannot leave an enchanted castle, though he knows that peril and ruin lurk within its walls, the one supreme influence that had taken possession of Francis Tredethlyn had been the presence of Maude Hillary. From first to last his faith had never wavered, but his devotion had been the servile worship of an idolator, who was prepared to find his divinity hard and merciless. No thought of ever being anything nearer to Maude Hillary than he now was entered the young man's mind. She was beautiful, amiable, loving—for had he not seen her with her father? She was all that is most lovely and adorable in womankind; but she was not for him. In her presence his ignorance and awkwardness seemed to weigh him down to the very dust, and yet she was never unkind to him, or supercilious, or insolent. She was only indifferent: but oh the bitterness of her indifference! the anguish of the slavish worshipper who prostrates himself before his idol, and knows all the while that it is stone, and cannot have pity upon him! Again and again Francis Tredethlyn had determined that he would come no more to the Cedars. He would call on Mr. Hillary in the city some morning, and thank him for his hospitable kindness; and then he would buy a commission in a cavalry regiment newly ordered for Indian service.

"Why should I be always coming here?" he thought. "They're all very good to me, the young swells. But I feel awkward amongst them still; and even if I could fall into their ways and make myself like them, which I can't, where would be the good? I don't want to be a 'swell;' I should like to be a soldier, with a regiment of glorious fellows to call me captain; or a farmer, with half a county to ride over, and a thousand sturdy laborers to take wages from me on a Saturday night; or a merchant, like Mr. Hillary, with a small fleet of ships on the high seas. That sort of thing would be life. But to dawdle in a billiard-room, or lounge at Tattersall's, and buy a horse one doesn't want, out of sheer idleness, and sell him at a loss three weeks afterwards, or to go for a yachting excursion off the Isle of Wight, with men to do all the work, and nothing to do one's self except to lie on one's back and smoke and drink pale ale all day long—I can't fancy such a life as that. So why should I come here any more? I can't fall naturally into these people's habits. I think sometimes that I was happier out yonder, brushing the captain's clothes and talking to the convicts. What a fellow that Surly Bill was! By Jove! that man had seen life!"

Mr. Tredethlyn, lounging perpetually in the gardens by the river, conscious of his incapability of breaking the spell that bound him, thought, with some touch of envy, of the brilliant career of his late acquaintance, Surly Bill, the burglar. But now the Cornishman had been all at once aroused from the pleasant torpor which had crept upon him in this modern Castle of Indolence. All that was most generous in the young man's nature rose in revolt against the thought that he had wronged Julia Desmond.

"It seems so hard that she should have set these people talking about her by her kindness to an ignorant fellow like me. It must do a girl harm to have her name handied about by an idle young fellow like Somerset. And she stands alone in the world, too, with no father or brother to take her part. I ought to have told that fellow to hold his tongue, and I will, too, before I leave this house to-night. But this decides me, at any rate. I've been here too much; I'll buy a commission and go out to India, and the lawyers must look after poor little Susie."

THE STEAM FIRE ENGINES OF NEW YORK.

We devote a considerable portion of the present number to illustrate the far-famed steam fire engines of New York. According to the last report of the Chief-Engineer, the Fire Department at the present time consists of 14 engineers, 2,195 members of engine companies, 1,184 members of hose companies, and 568 members of hook and ladder companies, presenting a total of 3,960 men. These are divided into 52 engine companies, 55 hose companies, and 18 hook and ladder companies.

There are 27 steam engines in good condition, 2 ordinary and 4 building; 4 hand engines in good condition, 14 ordinary and 1 building; 35 hose carriages in good condition, and 20 ordinary; 15 hook and ladder trucks in good condition, and 3 ordinary; and 56 hose, coal and wood tenders in good condition, and 20 ordinary.

HUDSON ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 1.

Stationed at 304 West 47th street, between 8th and 9th avenues. Performs duty in the 1st and 2d Districts. This steam engine is put down in the 3d class, 8-inch cylinder, 8-inch stroke, 4¾-inch pump, and was built in 1864. This company, which is No. 1, consists of 50 men; 400 feet of leather hose and 200 feet of rubber hose—all in excellent condition. John Hamill, Foreman.

EXCELSIOR ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 2.

Stationed at 21 Henry street. Performs duty in the 7th and 8th Districts. This engine is called 2d class, 4½-inch pump, 8-inch steam cylinder, 12-inch stroke, in very good order, and was built in 1861. It has 200 feet of leather hose and 300 feet of rubber—present number of men, 49. R. A. Jones, Foreman.

NIAGARA ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 4.

Stationed at No. 220 Mercer street. Performs duty in the 4th and 5th Districts. It has 8½-inch steam cylinder, 9-inch stroke, 4¾-inch pump, and was built in 1863. It has 300 feet leather hose and 200 feet rubber—number of men 41. Thomas Leary, Foreman.

PROTECTION ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 5.

Stationed at 61 Ann street. Performs duty in the 7th and 8th Districts. This engine was built in 1861. It has 200 feet of rubber and 300 feet of leather hose—number of men, 38. Thomas Macauley, Foreman.

EXEMPT ENGINE COMPANY.

Stationed in Centre street—Park. This is a fire engine of the old pattern, and propels itself. John G. Gorman, Foreman.

AMERICUS ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 6.

Stationed at 269 Henry street. Performs duty in the 7th and 8th Districts. This engine was built in 1861, by Messrs. Silsby, Mynderse & Co., Seneca Falls, N. Y.—whose establishment we notice in another part of our paper. It has 200 feet of rubber hose and 300 feet of leather; the company consists of 48 men. Anthony Burke, Foreman.

LEXINGTON ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 7.

Stationed at 109 East 25th street. Performs duty in the 1st and 5th Districts. This engine is a rotary pump, and was built in 1860 by the firm already named, Silsby & Co., of Seneca Falls. It has 300 feet of leather hose and 300 feet of rubber. Hans J. Gladney, Foreman.

MANHATTAN ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 8.

Stationed at 91 Ludlow street. Performs duty in the 7th and 8th Districts. This engine was built in 1859, but was rebuilt a short time ago, and is, of course, in most excellent condition. It has 300 feet of rubber and 200 feet of leather hose; number of men, 43. G. T. Paterson, Foreman.

MARION ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 9.

Situated at No. 47 Marion street. Performs duty in the 4th and 5th Districts. This engine is rated 3d class, 7½-inch steam cylinder, 8½-inch stroke, 4½ pump, built in 1862; number of men, 50. James Hayes, Foreman.

WATERWITCH ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 10.

Situated at 82d street and 4th avenue. Performs duty in the 1st and Yorkville Districts. This engine has 8½-inch cylinder, 9-inch stroke, 4¾-inch pump, and was built in 1864. It has 400 feet of leather hose and 200 rubber; number of men, 39. William Banham, Jr., Foreman.

OCEANUS ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 11.

Stationed at 99 Wooster street. Performs duty in the 3d and 8th Districts; 7½ inch cylinder, 9-inch stroke, 4½-inch pump; built in 1862 by James Smith, of New York, whose establishment is noticed in another column. Present number of men, 42; 400 feet leather hose and 200 feet of rubber hose. Christopher Johnson, Foreman.

KNICKERBOCKER ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 12.

Stationed at 112 East 33d street. Performs duty in 1st and 5th Districts. This is quite a new steam engine, and was built by James Smith; 8-inch steam cylinder, 9-inch stroke, 5-inch pump. Number of men, 46; 400 feet leather hose and 200 feet rubber. Bartley Donohue, Foreman.

EAGLE ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 13.

Stationed at 261 William street. Performs duty in 7th and 8th Districts. This engine is new, and built by James Smith; 7½-inch cylinder, 5-inch pump; 300 feet leather and 200 feet of rubber hose. Number of men, 41. A. J. Fullerton, Foreman.

HIBERNIAN ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 15.

Stationed at 432 West 36th street. Performs duty in the 1st and 2d Districts. This is 8-inch cylinder, 8-inch stroke, 4¾ pump; 400 feet leather and 200 feet of rubber. Number of men, 46. Christopher Bathe, Foreman.

MOHAWK ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 16.

Stationed at 7 North Moore street. Performs duty in the 3d and 4th Districts. Engine 2d class, piano style, formerly used by Engine Company No. 13. Number of men, 34. 700 feet of hose. Walter J. Young, Foreman.

WASHINGTON ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 20.

Stationed at 100 Cedar street. Performs duty in 7th and 8th Districts. This is a new engine, 8½-inch cylinder, 9-inch stroke, 4¾-inch pump; 300 feet leather and 200 feet rubber hose. Number of men, 50. J. Kennefick, Foreman.

PROTECTOR ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 22.

Stationed at corner of Chambers and Centre streets. Performs duty in the 7th and 8th Districts. Built in 1863. Number of men, 38; 300 feet of leather hose and 200 feet of rubber. Thomas Higgins, Foreman.

JACKSON ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 24.

Stationed at 279 West 17th street. Performs duty in the 3d and 4th Districts. Engine new, 7½-inch cylinder, 9-inch stroke, 4½-inch pump, built by James Smith. Number of men, 42; 400 feet of leather hose and 200 feet of rubber hose. John J. Loughery, Forman.

JEFFERSON ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 26.

Stationed at 148 5th street. Performs duty in 5th and 6th Districts. This is rated in the report as 3d class; 4-inch pump, 8½-inch cylinder, 9-inch stroke, built in 1861. Number of men, 31; 400 feet of leather and 200 feet of rubber. Oliver H. Kingsland, Foreman.

PACIFIC ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 28.

Stationed at 377 4th Avenue. Performs duty in the 1st and 5th Districts. 8-inch steam cylinder, 9-inch stroke, and 5-inch pump; built in 1863 by James Smith. Number of men, 42; 400 feet of leather hose, and 200 feet of rubber. Moses Fitzgerald, Foreman.

GUARDIAN ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 29.

Stationed at 26 West 10th street. Performs duty in the 3d and 4th Districts. House in good condition. Steam engine, second class, 7-inch steam cylinder, 9-inch pump, 8½-inch stroke, in good condition; built in 1859 by Lee & Larned, New York; rebuilt in 1864 by James Smith. Present number of men, 44. 300 feet of leather hose and 300 feet of rubber, in good condition; also a four-wheeled wood tender, in good condition. Terence McGowan, Foreman.

NORTH RIVER ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 30.

Stationed at 173 Franklin street. Performs duty in the 3d and 8th Districts. Engine, 8½-inch steam cylinders, 9-inch stroke, 5-inch pump. Built in 1863. Number of men, 30; 400 feet of leather hose, and 200 feet of rubber. J. L. Gascon, Foreman.

PETERSON ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 31.

Stationed at 49 Christie street. Performs duty in the 7th and 8th Districts. This capital engine was built by James Smith. This company numbers 46 men. Francis Mahedy, Foreman.

BLACK JOKE ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 33.

Stationed at 58th street, near Broadway. Performs duty in 2d District. Engine, second class, 7½-inch steam cylinder, 9-inch stroke, 4½-inch pump, in good condition. Built in 1861, by James Smith. Present number of men, 48; 300 feet of leather hose and 300 feet of rubber hose. W. H. Masterson, Foreman.

TRADESMAN ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 37.

Stationed at 59th street, between 2d and 3d avenues. Performs duty in the 1st and 2d Districts. New engine, 8-inch steam cylinder, 8-inch stroke, 4¾-inch pump. Number of men, 41; 400 feet of leather hose and 200 feet of rubber. Michael Haley, Foreman.

SOUTHWARK ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 38.

Stationed at 28 Ann street. Performs duty in the 7th and 8th Districts. Engine, first-class, 9-inch steam cylinder, 8½ inch stroke, diameter of pump 12¾-inch, built in 1860. Number of men, 33; 300 feet of leather and 300 feet of rubber hose. John C. White, Foreman.

LADY WASHINGTON ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 40.

Stationed at 173 Elm street. Performs duty in the 6th and 7th Districts. Engine second class, 8½-cylinder, 9-inch stroke, in good condition, built in 1860 by James Smith, formerly belonged to Engine Company No. 30. Number of men, 41; 350 feet of hose, ordinary, and 200 feet in good condition. Hugh Bonner, Foreman.

EMPIRE ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 42.

Stationed at 4 Centre street. Performs duty in the 7th and 8th Districts; 4½-inch pump, 9½-inch cylinder, 10-inch stroke, built in 1861; 300 feet of leather and 300 feet rubber hose. Gilbert G. Orr, Foreman.

VALLEY FORGE ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 46.

Stationed at 138 West 37th street. Performs duty in the 1st and 2d Districts. Engine second class, 7-inch steam cylinder, 8-inch stroke and 9-inch pump, in ordinary condition, built in 1859 by Lee & Larned. Present number of men, 41; 300 feet of rubber and 200 feet of leather hose. Francis E. Skelding, Foreman.

CROTON ENGINE COMPANY, NO 47.

Stationed at 165 West 20th street. Performs duty in the 3d and 4th Districts. Present number of men, 34; 250 feet rubber and 250 feet leather hose. Philip Cosgriff, Foreman.

MAZEPPA ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 48.

Stationed at 227 West 25th street. Performs duty in the 2d and 3d Districts. New engine, 8-inch steam cylinder, 9-inch stroke, 5-inch pump, built by James Smith, the eminent machinist. Number of men, 49; 400 feet leather and 200 feet of rubber hose. Charles Cowen, Foreman.

MUTUAL ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 51.

Stationed at 161 East 22d street, between 1st and 2d Avenues. Performs duty in the 1st and 5th Districts. Temporary location. New steam engine, 8-inch cylinder, 8-inch stroke, 4¾-inch pump. Number of men, 44; 400 feet of leather and 200 feet of rubber hose. Peter Gray, Foreman.

UNDINE ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 52.

Stationed at 122d street, between 2d and 2d Avenues. Performs duty in Harlem and vicinity. Steam-engine, third class, 7 -inch cylinder, 8½ inch stroke, in good condition, built in 1862. Number of men, 41; 200 feet of rubber and 400 feet of leather hose. S. H. E. Lynch, Foreman.

HUDSON RIVER ENGINE COMPANY, NO. 53.

Stationed at 304 Washington street. Performs duty in the 7th and 8th Districts. Engine, 7-inch steam cylinder, 8-inch stroke, 5-inch pump, in good condition, built in 1859 by James Smith. Number of men, 50; 200 feet of leather and 300 feet of rubber hose. Terence Duffy, foreman.

We have thus given a most accurate description and picture of every kind of engine now used in the Empire City—the fact of there being some of the companies omitted is explained on the ground that the pattern they use is identical with some of those engraved.

Among the manufacturers of these beautiful and complex machines, the most prominent are H. C. Silsby, of Seneca Falls, and James Smith, of New York, both of whom deserve a brief account at our hands.

The rotary steam fire engines built at the Island Works, Seneca Falls, N. Y., are considered as among the very finest ever constructed. This large establishment is now owned exclusively by H. C. Silsby, Esq., who has been its principal proprietor and manager for many years. It is now mainly devoted to the manufacture of steam fire engines, and a scientific paper says:

"It is conceded to furnish the most simple and reliable machines for the purpose now in use."

The manufacturer claims that the machines made at the Island Works possess peculiar advantages, including great power with low pressure of steam, even and uniform pressure upon the leading hose, not causing them to burst, although they force water much further than any other engine. The boiler used is Cloff's Patent Circulating Tube, a quick and rapid steam generator, very easily kept in repair. The engine and pump are Holly's Patent Rotary, having no valves or connecting rods or other complications liable to get out of order. The engine is warranted by the manufacturer to give satisfaction in ever particular, and the one of his make, owned and used in Rochester, N. Y., has given the completest satisfaction, and cost much less for repairs than any one of the machines obtained from other sources. Three sizes are made, costing at the present time from $4,000 to $6,000. We believe one or two of the machines are furnished with either hand or horse tongue as preferred, but the largest size is drawn only by horse power.

A scientific journal says: "The rotary principle is desirable on account of the ease of its operation, and the absence of the crank motion which is found in all reciprocating machines, and which is so detrimental to their durability. The high speed to which all engines are obliged to be run to force water makes it necessary that the piston or reciprocating machine should go very regular and happy to stand the jerking and straining which they are subjected to, in passing the engines. The Rotary Engine has none of that difficulty to contend against—the machine stands perfectly still when in operation, no necessity for blocking the wheels, or picking off from the springs; there is no vibration of the bow, and the pressure being steady and uniform, does not strain the hose like the blows of the piston. How that will not stand the pressure of the piston, to force water say 300 feet, will stand the uniform pressure of the Rotary to force 300 feet or over. Hose used as a Rotary Machine will wear much longer than used on a Piston Engine, as it keys perfectly still while the machinery is in operation, consequently does not wear out by friction, upon the ground or pavements. Any man can hold the pipe of a Rotary Machine as easily as those on the pipe of a Piston Machine. This is of great advantage in ascending ladders to play into upper stories of a building.

The machine mounted on the top of the machine instead of on the ground, can in most cases run the condition of the hose and the pipemen, and can let on more or less pressure, as circumstances require; and, being located above the crowd that usually forms around an engine, can graduate the speed of his engine, according to the necessity of the foreman or chief engineer, which they can convey to him by signs or signals, while at a distance from the engine. This has been found of great advantage in actual service. Another great advantage is the low pressure of steam with which the Rotary can be run, viz: from 20 to 40 pounds, it being seldom necessary to use over 40 pounds to do effective fire duty."

VIEW OF JAIL AT SAVANNAH, GA.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, W. T. CRANE.

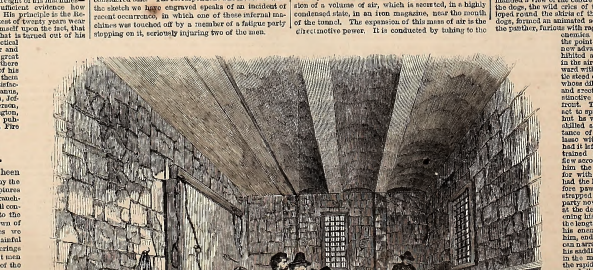
DIGGING UP TORPEDOES NEAR SISTER'S FERRY.

SISTER'S FERRY is in Effingham county, Ga. The fatigue parties sent out from Sherman's army, in the course of their explorations, found quantities of torpedoes on the road running through the swamp in this vicinity. They are mostly constructed of 12 pound shell, with percussion caps attached to the fuse, and the whole covered by a tin cup in such a manner that any pressure on the cup would explode the shell. A few larger ones were found constructed of copper, about the size of a two gallon jug, and are exploded on the same principle. Some 30 of these mischievous hypocrites were cleared from the road before it was considered safe. The correspondent who hovers on with the sketch we have engraved speaks of an incident of recent occurrence, in which one of those infernal machines was touched off by a member of a fatigue party stepping on it, seriously injuring two of the men.

PRISONER IN BARREL JACKET.

Between the 7th and 8th Avenues in 26th street there is the large establishment of Novelty engines in this city. It is a perfect model of neatness and order, and he well worth a visit on purely industrial grounds. It is not by new, and is one of the best specimens of commercial architecture we have seen. It occupies considerable space, but is so admirably arranged as to afford even larger facilities than even its space suggests. Mr. James Smith, the proprietor of this establishment, is the oldest steam fire engine manufacturer on this continent, and the fact that we have illustrated eight of his machines—all of different patterns—is unofficial evidence how highly his engines are prized. His principle is the Reciprocating, and has stood the test of twenty years wear and tear. Mr. Smith prides himself upon the fact, that he encumbers all of the work that is turned out of his establishment, and being a practical mechanic of the highest order and greatest experience, this is a great recommendation. We believe there is no instance known of any of his engines breaking down, all of them having given the greatest satisfaction. The boys of the Oceanus, Knickerbocker, Eagle, Jackson, Jefferson, Pacific, Columbia, Perseverance, Black John, and Lady Washington, are of the same opinion as the public, for James Smith's Steam Fire Engines cannot be beat.

SAVANNAH, GA.



THOUGH Savannah has been forced into the background by the more recent and important captures of Charleston, Wilmington, Branchville and Columbia, there is still considerable interest attaching to the half repentant Sea Queen town of Georgia. The three sketches we publish to-day possess a painful interest, for they tell of sufferings endured by such of our gallant men who fell into the brutal hands of the Confederate authorities—men who, in their 4th of July orations, made the air ring with their denunciation of British cruelties at Dartmoor and the prison hulks of Brooklyn.

The Jail

is a peculiar-looking affair, built in the manner of some of our armories. Here were confined many of the Union prisoners, and it is said the treatment was of the same description as at Millen and Andersonville.

The Interior.

Our Artist has sketched the inside of one of those rooms of torture, being that special one in which prisoners were stripped and tied to the whipping board and then flogged until their backs were raw. In this condition they were put into a vat of brine. We are not aware that such outrages have been committed on our prisoners, but they were of daily occurrence in the old regime, when negroes were the offenders. We also reproduce an exact picture of the various instruments of coercion. The jail is now in charge of Capt. Charles Courtois, Provost-Marshal of the 2d Brigade, 20th Army corps, an officer of great ability and courtesy.

BRANDING HORSES AND MULES.

OUR Artist has sent up a lively sketch, illustrating a scene very characteristic of Sherman's "gentle march" through Georgia. The men are busily marking the live stock swept up along the track of their victorious career. The interest of the affair depends greatly upon the various tempers of the victims, a large proportion of these having partaken of the revolutionary principles of their late masters.

TUNNELING THE ALPS.

newspapers as the percement du Mont Cenis, has been approved by the Parliament and decreed by the Piedmontese Government, thanks to the wise determination and energy of Count Cavour. It has now been for some years under way, and its importance is daily demonstrated by the increasing traffic between France and Italy. We exhibit this week a picture of the ingenious machine used in the perforation.

The motive power is obtained from a cataract in the vicinity. This natural force is applied to the compression of a volume of air, which is secreted, in a highly condensed state, in an iron magazine, near the mouth of the tunnel. The expansion of this mass of air is the electromotive power. It is conducted by tubing to the machinery, which it drives by the force of its escape, after which it is of vast utility in ventilating the shaft. Ten holes are drilled at once in this manner, a pit of water applied to each to cool the steel and wash out the dust. These are then filled with powder and exploded, the engine returning on its tramway to a place of safety, after which the operation is repeated. The distance now excavated is 4,100 metres, that still to be opened 8,120 metres. The date 1871 is fixed for the completion of this vast work

THE FLAG ON FORT SUMTER.

UPON the evacuation of Charleston on the night of the 17th, Anthony Dahlgren lost no time in procuring his six-oared gig, and arrived at the city about two o'clock next day. He was quickly succeeded by Gen. Q. A. Gillmore, who followed in the steamer W. W. Coit, and to an Aide-de-camp on his staff, Capt Henry M. Bragg, belongs the honor of planting the Stars and laying the Stripes once more on the battered ruins of Sumter. His rude flagstaff—an impromptu spike of a boathook upon an oar—has ere this been replaced by something of firmer stuff: but in a moral sense and in practical effect our national flag commenced at that moment to cover with a protecting shield and an abiding authority the fort, the harbor and the town.

PRISONER GAGGED AND FETTERED.

PANTHER HUNT.

A BRITISH traveller in Brazil gives the following account of a panther hunt near the Villa de Feritas: "Finding I still persisted in my favorite pursuit, the General good-naturedly resolved on gratifying me with the spectacle of a panther hunt. Accompanied by his sons, we rode out early in the morning to an extensive plain, in the centre of which was a jungle, into into the Vaqueros had succeeded in driving on the previous night. A large panther, preparatory to the morning's sport. We took our station on an eminence which commanded a view of the centre field. The loud barking of the dogs, the wild cries of the Indians, as they pressed forward the skirts of the jungle, cheering on the dogs, formed an animated scene. Suddenly a yell of fear, the panther, furious with rage, sprang forth to meet his enemies. The Vaqueros rallied to the point from which he had issued or advanced to the attack. He exhibited a beautiful sight, whirling in the air his lasso, and urging forward with the spur the spirited Arab steed on which he was mounted, whose dilated nostrils, fiery eyeballs and erect mane, proclaimed his passionate dread of the enemy in his front. The panther crouched as he set to spring on his advancing foe, but he was forestalled by the well skilled cavalier, who, at the distance of twenty yards, threw his lasso with unerring aim. Scarcely had it left his hand before the well trained horse wheeled round and drew across the plain, dragging after him the already disabled panther, for with such unerring precision had the lasso been thrown, that the fore paw of the animal was fairly strapped to his back. The whole party now dashed forward to be in at the death. The Vaqueiro, slackening his pace gradually shortened the length of the cord till it brought his enemy within a few yards of him, and then, in less time than I can narrate it, I saw him drop from his saddle, his broad knife gleaming in his sinewy, muscular, and wiry the rapidity of lightning having the cord, it was evident, in the hands of the panther."

A RECENT of the following inscription on a gravestone in Williamsport, Pa., is in circulation: "Sacred to the Memory of Henry Harris Born June 30th 1831 of Henry Harris and Jane his Wife. Died on the 4th of May 1857 by the kick of a colt in his Bowels peceasable and quiet, a Friend to his Father & Mother & respected by all who knew him and went to the world where horses can't kick and sorrows & weeping is no more."

SOME idea of the enormous value of building ground in Paris may be formed from the fact that $5,000,000 are demanded by the proprietary of the Grand Hotel on the Boulevard des Capucines, for removing a small portion of the block which makes the view of the new OPERA HOUSE.

MDLLE. HELENE DE KATOW.

THIS lady, who made so successful a début lately at Max Strakosch's concert, is one of the most remarkable of European violoncello players. She is the granddaughter of Prince de Polignac, Minister of the Emperor Nicholas, who was exiled with his son, the father of this lady. The latter changed his name and assumed that of Katow, the name of an ancestral estate in Poland. Mdlle. de Katow's title is the Countess Poliowan Polkin.

She was born in Riga, Russia, but at an early age went with her parents to Paris. It was at Riga, and at the age of 11 years, that she took her first music lessons from Brandt, the nephew of the celebrated Carl Maria von Weber, and received instructions also in French literature from Massé, the well-known author. Devoted enthusiastically to the study of art, Mdlle. de Katow was able, in March, 1859, to make her first appearance before an audience in the Hotel-de-Ville, Paris, for the Société des Beaux-Arts. After the concert, at which she was the principal attraction, and where her success was marked, she was honored with diplomas of membership, signed by all the members of the society. Encouraged by the favor which she had thus obtained, she subsequently gave a grand concert at the Salle Herz, assisted by several of the musical celebrities of Paris. Of her performance on this occasion the Revue de la Gazette Musicale de Paris says: "Mdlle. de Katow plays with largeness and brilliancy; her style is pure and elevated, and recalls the best qualities of her distinguished master, Servais. Possessed in the high, est degree of the grace and sentiment which belong to her sex, she yet exhibits a strength and executive skill which enable her to master the instrument perfectly, with its infinite and beautiful effects."

Ever desirous of an opportunity of improving herself, she entered the Conservatoire, and for two years devoted herself exclusively to study. At the end of the second year she received the first prize, although amongst her competitors were pupils who had already been five years in the establishment. The piece performed at the Distribution was "Le Désir," by Servais, and on the occasion the Duchess of Brabant, who had taken much interest in the young artist, decorated her with the Golden Medal of King Leopold, and placed on her brow a crown of burnt. It was during her stay in the Belgian capital that she became acquainted with Victor Hugo, who was then engaged on those chapters of "Les Misérables," which deserve so wonderfully the great days of Waterloo. He would frequently request Mdlle. de Katow to play for him, and would even indicate the mood in which the literary labors required to be attuned. In recompense for her kindness the distinguished poet, having for his island house, presented her the first copy of his immortal work, with these words inscribed on the first leaf:

"Hommage à l'heureux et charmant talent de Mdlle. Hélène Katow.—Un admirateur enthousiaste,

"VICTOR HUGO."

From the period we have indicated to the present time Mdlle. de Katow has performed almost incessantly in public, and with unvarying success. At Berlin, after a brilliant series of concerts, she had the honor to be appointed virtuoso to King Frederick William. She was also made honorary member of several Philharmonic Societies—associations that are not prodigal of their favors. It was whilst playing before the Ambassador of France, M. Talleyrand de Perigord, whose name will be remembered in connection with a recent duel, that she was heard by Maurice Strakosch, who had Adelina Patti at the same concerts. He immediately made proposals to the lady for America, and after a long negotiation he succeeded in engaging her for his younger brother, Max Strakosch, who intends making a tour with her through the United States and Cuba.

GOING TO LAW IN CEYLON.

KANDIE KATTEKAMER and Kaslar Tambyar are neighbors. There has for sometime past been a growing ill-feeling between these two worthies and their families. They are joint shareholders in a Palmyra garden; that is to say, the one has an undivided share in it to the extent, he says of 5-8th of 3-20th (2-32ds by inheritance, and 2-47ds in favor of his wife); the other was some equally minute subdivision; and there is a difference of opinion between them as to the ownership of one particular tree. The Palmyra season is fully come. Every few minutes you hear a "dop" in all the gardens, and then there is a rush of two or three persons, and perhaps a shout, and a cry, and a row, and if you inquire what it is about, you are told that it is a fruit that like the apple of discord, has fallen from a Palmyra tree, about which there is a dispute, and the struggle is disputing which shareholder shall basket the prize.

Our worthy neighbors aforesaid, whom for the sake of brevity, we will call K. and T., have each set one of their offspring to watch the fallen fruit, with strict injunction to hold their own. Young Master K, his mother's pride, spots under a tree, basket beside him, and beguiles the time by tearing asunder with his teeth one of the yellow colored stringy fruits, till his hands are a fine rich ochre. Miss T., a young lady about four years, Master K's senior, who knows how to make good use of her nails, takes up her position. The tree in dispute lies between them.

"Dop" goes a fruit behind Master K.; up jumps Miss T., but sits down again; the fruit has fallen from a tree that is without dispute in K.'s domain. Master K., therefore, appropriates it unmolested.

Presently there is a dop from one of Miss T.'s trees, and up she jumps and pursues the bounding ball till she has secured it.

At last "dop" comes a fruit from the tree; up jump both and make a rush at it. It rolls towards Master K., and thus for both fortune favor him; but too wise a strategist to leave unguarded his already secured fruits, he runs dragging his half filled basket after him. So likewise does Miss T. Master K. seizes his prize, or rather he stoops to seize it, and his hand is just upon it, when down comes Miss T. like a wolf on the fold, gives him a shove, and over he goes basket and all, and she gets hold of the fruit; round he turns quick as thought, and gives her a punch in the side; down go her basket and nuts, and in a moment her ten claws are in an unpleasant proximity to Master K.'s eyes.

"My father and mother, I am dead!" cries he.

Out rushes his fond, paternal parent, his mother following with shrieks. Out come Mr. and Mrs. T. from their sheds, and in no time Mr. K. has laid a short, thick stick over Mrs. T.'s head, and left her stunned and bleeding; while he and Mr. T. are rolling over each other on the ground, their long hair streaming about them. In rush the neighbors and separate them. Loud is the strife of words, foul beyond expression the abuse by the females.

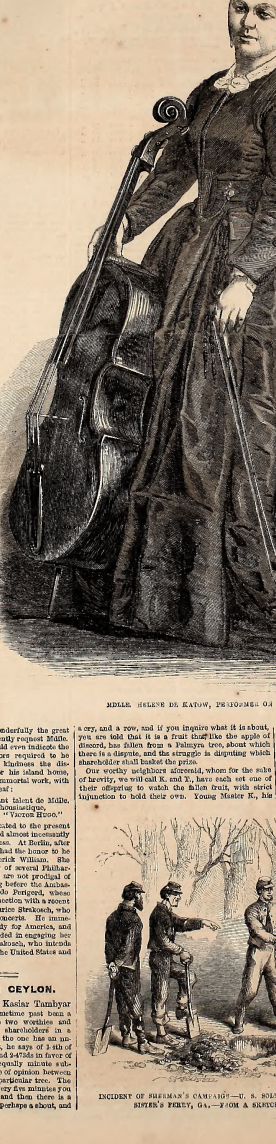
"To the court with your wounded wife," says a friend and away they go to their respective houses, screaming at each other all the while, and a swift runner is dispatched the to police Vidahn by the party of Mr. K., who, having wounds and blood to show, is in the better position.

"This will never do," says K.'s elder brother, a veteran litigant. "You, too, must have blood and bruises to show."

"Well, you see, I have a scratch here and a bighump there, and am all over sand and dirt," says K.

"Oh, that's good as far as it goes, but it is not enough; we must do some more. Come here," says he to Master K., the valiant who began the affray: "let me see your face."

Master K., unsuspicious of evil, submits to his uncle's inspection, and in a second his worthy relative has drawn a sharp knife over an inch of Master K.'s forehead, and the red blood oozes streaming down.



"That will do," says he: "now carry him off to the court before the others are ready. Get there first, and I'll follow with a formidable kind of cleaver much used by the natives)

Off starts the procession, Master K. carried in the arms of his afflicted father, the blood upon his face carefully preserved to create the greater sensation, his head thrown back, his eyes languishing, his lips partially open, his hands dangling feebly by his side. Close behind him comes his maternal parent. "A Nioke, all tears," her clothes-cloth locks streaming over her shoulders, her head bandied, all appearances disregarded in the affliction of the moment. Straight into the compound of the magistrate they rush, while other relatives follow, and a crowd collected on the way gathers around the gate.

"Oh, my Lord," cries Mrs. K., and falls prostrate on the floor before the gentleman, and straightway Mr. K. lays his seemingly senseless burden before the "Dorey."

If that functionary has had some experience, and suspects that Master K. is shamming, he will, perhaps, unexpectedly apply a little smelling salts to his nose, and will then find out the trick. But, if very green, he will probably be taken in, and, after having given several very stringent orders for the apprehension of the accused, he will, just as he has gone inside again (he roused by the K. and his party, bringing in Mrs. T. in a sort of palanquin, with her head out open. Both parties then enter cases against each other, and the magistrate has, amidst the most confusing testimony, to determine whether both cases are true or false, or which is true and which is false.

There is no exaggeration in the above; it is what happens daily.

MDLLE. HELENE DE KATOW, PERFORMER ON THE VIOLONCELLO.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.

INCIDENT OF SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN.—U. S. SOLDIERS BLOWING UP INFERNAL MACHINES NEAR SUMTER'S FERRY, GA.—FROM A SKETCH BY G. J. SCOBY, 149TH N. Y. V.

THE COST OF WAR.—It is stated that the armies of Europe have a total of 4,594,000 men, costing annually $453,000,000. Russia has the largest army, numbering 1,800,000 men. That of France, numbers over 700,000 men. This is on a peace basis. If war prevailed the number of soldiers would, doubtless, be largely increased. All this vast outlay is devoted to the wasting of human life and property. It is used to destroy, not to build up. Who can estimate the good this amount of labor could accomplish for the happiness of the human ject. If it was employed in the arts of peace? It is almost incalculable. In the United States, for the past three years, more than a million of men have been engaged in the work of destruction, consuming and destroying what has required years of industry to accumulate. If the same energy and expenditure had been used in developing the resources of the country, increasing the facilities of intercommunication, and adding to all the requisites of moral, intellectual and physical improvement as has been in the civil war which now is convulsing our accursed country, what would have made us not only the strongest nation upon the face of the earth, but added vastly to the individual well-being of the people. The experience of thousands of years has only failed to teach mankind the folly of war, nor has the boasted increase in civilization and Christianity diminished in the least degree the ferocity or the enthusiasm of either national or individual difficulties. In fact the most mankind revere is he who has made no advance upon the darkest ages in the world's history.

The transmutation of sounds is one of the most curious mysteries of the air. A word spoken in the forests of our eastern coast can be heard in the forks of an opposite village hundreds of yards away. Such a principle we shall have illustrated in the new Academy of Agriculture, in Sicily. The architect—very probably intending to astonish the natives—has designed the new form, with corresponding opposite ellipses, in which, whenever one should head all the seats are required to be given. A horrible amount of sound immediately springs up in any place where the speakers are seen addressing into an unaccountable publicity. The church soon becomes a perfect pit of truth that nothing will be able to hold in it. At last, by chance, a discovery was made of the law-abiding issues, and the whole thing was stopped.

The cricket is a curious little insect. It has gone into the world's proverbial expressions in France people say, "chilly as a cricket," while in England and America we say "as merry as a cricket." Crickets are gone, seeds and fruit, conveying them to their holes, and there, in the new-year, feed of drinking the dew of leaves and flowers, they are very careful not to eat anything that will decay in warm weather. In the early young live in peace, but when they grow up their manhood a mania for fighting descends, and they commence fighting with one another. The boys in Germany are very fond of keeping crickets in boxes for the sake of their song, and for the purpose of watching their battles. What the pigeon is to the Arab, the cock to the Malay, and the Englishman, the cricket is to the German youth. Their passions are very easily and soon excited, according to the way in which they happen to meet they will turn their backs and kick like horses, or stand up and the contest is according to its ferocity until one of the combatants runs away from the field of battle. It is to be remembered that the European house-cricket is not known in the country. Its song is much more shrill and much sweeter than that of the species which sound those lively notes in the fields.

In the oil regions, when the precious fluid is struck, great care is necessary to prevent accidents. The gas, which is almost inflammable, and the water, which has been reached, rushes up with great force, and, being highly combustible, it is dangerous to go with a light where near the well; even a pipe or cigar has in some cases been the cause of the fire, or an explosion, the destruction of life and property. In a few instances the gas has been confined and charged for weeks, the mouth of the well being conveyed into a mighty gas-burner, from which it was supposed it would be shed like a fire for days on end. Such a one, by the name of Jacob Crown, was standing on Mr. George's Creek, Pennsylvania, on Fri., and when the cold stream the oil spouted a powerful column of water, and the attended fireman, who had already endured, but experienced horror how or pursuit fire anywhere in the vicinity, up which he was working.

EXPERIMENTS have been making in France for a year or more to substitute the China grass, or nettle-weed, which can be grown in all parts of France, for cotton, and which was demonstrated before the Emperor at the Chamber of Commerce of Rouen, by the week, by the raw fibre, and by various specimens of woven, colored and bleached cloth, that the substitute is possible in every point—washing and wearing—for that of cotton.

Hannah Young has issued a sort of manifesto on theatres. He considers the theatre an innocent and decent place of resort, but thinks the present establishment in Great Salt Lake City should be conducted on a higher moral standard than theatres in the States. He objects to evil of plays in which great crimes are represented, in which the display of villainy forms a prominent part.

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical PINEAPPLE CIDER

is a PREVENTIVE OF SICKNESS. The experience that Dr. Talbot has had during the last two years and a-half convinces him that it is time the public had some effectual relief from the scourge of disease. The cures effected by Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, designed for all weathers and ages, as a sure preventive of disease, fully is entirely new to the public. One quart bottle will last a well person for a month. It is not a new recipe of doctoring; nevertheless it will save millions from being sick. It is a PLEASURE to partake of, and a joy to the boy to bring sick, than to pay ten or twenty dollars at the conclusion of the year. Dr. Talbot has been engaged in the manufacture of cider for the private medicine, and has given up the commercial business to devote his whole time to the manufacture of this cider. The first thing after we rise in the morning, at the same time before we retire. It will invigorate, strengthen and give vigour and action to the system. A celebrated Dr. of this city says that he would not be without it for the Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that he gained ten pounds in one month by the use of it. Indeed, it continues its use as above directed, and finds it very much assists digestion, and prevents that constant sickness in his case. Also, another well-known gentleman in New York has used it for a month. City gentlemen say for years, and has not been sick one day during that time.

Price $2 per bottle (full quart); pints, $2; half-pints, $1. Orders must be accompanied by cash. Half gallon bottles sent free by express on receipt of price. All orders must be addressed to

ARCANA WATCH.
An Elegant Novelty in Watches.

The cause of this watch seeing entirely new invention, composed of six different metals combined, rolled together and plumished, producing an exact imitation of 18 carat gold, called Arcana, which will always keep its color. They are as beautiful and durable as solid gold and are afforded at one-eighth the cost. The case is beautifully designed, with Band and Shield for name, with Patent Push Pin, and engraved in the exact style of the celebrated Gold Hunting Levers, and are really handsome and desirable, and so exact an imitation of gold, as to defy detection. The movement is manufactured by the well-known St. Jimer Watch Company of Europe, and are superbly finished, having engraved plates, fancy carved bridges, adjusting regulator, with gold balance, and the improved recoil escapement, with fine dial and skeleton hands, and is warranted a good timekeeper. These watches are of three different sizes, the smallest being for ladies, and are all Hunting Cases. A case of six will be sent by mail or Express for $125. A single one sent in an elegant Morocco Case for $25, will readily sell for three times their cost. We are the sole agents for this watch in the United States, and have now on hand a large lot for Trade Only.

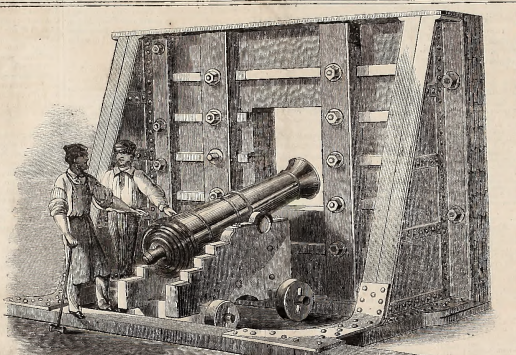
FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1865, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 494 Vol. XIX.] NEW YORK, MARCH 18, 1865. [PRICE 10 CENTS, $4 00 YEARLY, 13 WEEKS $1 00.



Richmond.

THE condition of affairs in the rebel capital is such as might be anticipated in view of the situation. It seems that the rebel Congress is working with barely a quorum, and the newspapers are calling on Gen. Lee to bring back the absconding legislators by force. Congress itself refuses leave of absence to a member who seeks it for a few days, on the pressing plea that it is necessary to remove his wife and family from the line of march of the "Vandal army"—meaning thereby that of Gen. Sherman. The refusal of some of the Senators from the Gulf States to support Gen. Lee's demand for negroes in the army is the occasion for an expression of bitterness almost equal to that bestowed on "Lincoln and his hordes." These States are told that, having cajoled and coerced the Border States into Secession, and brought upon them untold evils, the great Slavocracy refuses to sacrifice its "precious nigger" to rescue the Confederacy from absolute ruin. "The compact between these States is broken," exclaims the Richmond Sentinel, in despair. The animosity between the two sections—there are already sections and "sectional feelings" in Dixie, where all were to be "a band of brothers"—will be largely intensified by the recent message of Gov. Brown of Georgia, in which he takes open ground against the employment of negroes in the army, notwithstanding Gen. Lee pronounces it "not only expedient but necessary." You "cannot expect negroes to fight for the enslavement of their wives and children" is the not irrational proposition of Gov. Brown. Nor will he be regarded as deficient in logical sense when we find him proclaiming to his fellow-citizens, "when we arm the slaves, we abandon slavery." It is all very well for the representatives of Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, Arkansas and Virginia in the rebel Congress to assume theatrical airs, and express their willingness to give up slavery, in States where it is already dead, for the great boon of Southern independence. Further South it is slavery or nothing. "Independence" and participation in a third-rate power is a small equivalent for the sacrifice of Sambo. So, within less than four years after the formation of its "indissoluble compact," the Confederacy is openly declared to be broken down, and a sectional antagonism has arisen within it quite as virulent as ever existed in what the rebels irreverently call "the old concern."

While the sectional feuds to which we allude are spreading and intensifying military affairs are coming to a crisis. Preparations are evidently making for the abandonment of Richmond. It may be another desperate struggle will be made for its defence; but if this is contemplated, it is without faith in its success. The Richmond papers, as well as the Richmond people, have taken the alarm, and the city is racked with apprehension. "The abandonment of Richmond," exclaims the Examiner, "would be the loss of all respect and authority towards the Confederate Government, the disintegration of the army, and the abandonment of the scheme of an independent Southern Confederation. The war would, after that, speedily degenerate into an irregular contest, in which passion would have more to do than purpose; which would have no other object than the mere defence or present safety of those immediately persisting in it. The hope of establishing a Confederacy and securing its recognition among nations would be gone for ever. The common sense of the country, the instinct of every man and woman in the land contradicts the idea that any possibility of an independent South would remain after its capital was abandoned, its government set adrift, and its army withdrawn into the subtades of the interior."

That the steps are in progress for the very movement, of such disastrous import, is evidenced from the article of the Examiner itself, and appears equally from the efforts of the other papers of the doomed city to quiet and soothe the public mind.

Thus the Enquirer tries to disguise the significance of sending away machinery, guns, and the archives of the Government from the city, as follows:

"The air is filled with alarming rumors; every fear has found a voice, and everything is open to the tale it tells. Measures of precaution are construed to presage disaster. When the wagons and sick are ordered to the rear it is inferred that the army is about to retreat. It is time to proclaim order in the ranks and give the reassuring command, "Steady!" Let every man return to his post and give all his energy to the performance of his duty, while he listens to the words of encouragement from the soldiers in the front. Regard all street rumors as the soldiers do those of the camp. They know that none of the latter are wholly true, and most of them entirely false."

The Sentinel, which is the mouthpiece of Davis, is compelled to admit the public disquiet, and tries its best to explain away the "precautionary measures" which have caused so great alarm:

"A great deal of causeless disquiet has been created in our city by some movements which are purely precautionary, but which have been greatly misunderstood or misrepresented. We make this statement on authority and by request, in order to relieve the minds of our people of gratuitous anxieties. Nothing has been done or contemplated but what an ordinary prudence enjoins, or with any purpose that every citizen here would not approve and applaud. There is no foundation for the stories on which some build panics, and which others may embrace for the indulgence of prejudices."

The significance of these paragraphs is sufficiently obvious without comment. The evacuation of Richmond is certainly contemplated, as a measure of strategy, or as the probable necessary result of a battle. The events of the next ten days will tell.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Almanac for 1865 is the best work of its kind ever published, both for the number and beauty of its illustrations, and the valuable nature of the reading matter, consisting of statistics and information indispensable to all classes. In addition to over 60 splendid engravings of general subjects, it contains four lithographic portraits of Grant, Sherman, Sheridan and Farragut. Price 50 cents, with ornamental cover.

N.B.—As only a few copies remain unsold, and as it will not be reprinted, orders should be sent without delay to 537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Illustrated Almanac for 1865. This is the only work of the kind ever published, containing over 70 illustrations of great variety and beauty; besides beautiful portraits engraved on steel of Mrs. President Lincoln and Mrs. Gen. McClellan, and a graphic bathing scene at Long Branch. The reading matter is of the utmost importance to ladies, whether in the parlor, the nursery or the kitchen. In a word, it is a complete Lady's Manual. Price, in ornamental cover, 50 cents.

N.B.—As this valuable work will not be reprinted, and as only a few copies remain unsold, orders should be sent forthwith to FRANK LESLIE'S Publication Office, 537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Gentlemen—Having used your "Pain Killer" myself and seen it used by others a great many times, in cases of colic in horses, with the best of success, I take great pleasure in recommending it as the best medicine for the colic that I have ever used or seen used. For a dose I have generally given about two-thirds of the quantity there is in a 25 cent bottle, in a pint of warm milk and molasses.

Yours respectfully,

SAMUEL P. FISHER, of McLean, Ill.

Our Twentieth Volume.

OUR next number will commence the twentieth volume of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, a serial unrivalled for the number and beauty of its illustrations, and the excellence and variety of its literary contents. Having been the first to establish a successful Illustrated Paper on this continent, we may be pardoned if we feel gratified at issuing one so fully up to the requirements of the time. To achieve this we have spared no effort, no talent, no expense, and we believe we now present the public, week by week, a pictorial record of all that is exciting, absorbing, curious or important in the events of the day. In these respects it is so complete as to be really an illustrated history of our own times.

During the present civil war, our Artists have been wherever any operations were in progress, and we can truly affirm that no military or naval expedition of any importance has been without an Artist of acknowledged ability and experience from this establishment. Generals in every section have, in numberless instances, voluntarily attested the the spirit and fidelity of our sketches. This has been so well understood in Europe that they are constantly copied by the Illustrated Papers of London, Paris and Leipsic. This testimony to the superiority of our paper over all others has been gained at an immense outlay; over 80 Artists having been employed since the commencement of the war in making sketches for our pages.

The war correspondents of the public press are constantly referring to the presence and activity of our Special Artists—the latest instance being in the New York Tribune, who, in writing from Charleston, says, "There are now here two Artists of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, making sketches of all that is interesting," etc.

Nor is our ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER less attractive in its other features. It is the only one of the kind in America whose contents are entirely original. Every number contains an original poem, beautifully illustrated, an original story, with two striking illustrations, besides shorter original stories, sketches, &c., with a complete digest of the week's news, &c. It likewise contains a continued romance of great power by one of the first of living writers.

Those whose subscriptions expire with the volume should renew them at once, to avoid interruption in receiving the paper, as it is always next to impossible for us to supply back numbers.

Our friend the Peripatetic Philosopher, who sneers at us on account of our pretensions as "conservators of public morals," has pretensions equally extravagant, which he will not admit even to himself. He would feel offended if we were to intimate to him that he arrogates the character of the universal and infallible critic. Yet that is what he believes himself to be, unconsciously, perhaps, and it is in that capacity he impresses himself most on those who know him best. Now we don't object to him as a general critic, but we insist we shall be "conservators of public morals" after our own fashion. So we omit his "things personal," while we subscribe cordially to his comments on the great and growing Hog family.

"The Hog family is a large one in Shoddydom, the girls whereof you have gone crazy about—an absurd thing for a fellow of your years. Now I have no objection to Shoddy nor yet to Petroleum as elements in a social change. Anything to get rid of that venerable stupidity of New York, which grew up into stolid aristocracy by the sale of old cabbage gardens for building lots; but I want Shoddy and Petroleum to—well, I may as well say it plainly—keep its nose clean. Great numbers of their young male members look remarkably well since they have left off patronising Moses in Chatham street, and get their clothes, to measure, from respectable tailors in Broadway. But they should know that smoking cigars, albeit at a quarter a piece, on the crowded side of Broadway, is vulgar not to say indecent. It is a curious thing; I asked the names of a couple of young fellows whom my friend and I (my friend is president of a petroleum company) met fuming away like tar-kilns, the other afternoon, at high tide, in Broadway; I say it is a curious thing—he said their names were "Hog." We got into an omnibus soon after, and a rather dashing chap came in, slapped down the window, put his knee on the seat, and began to stare outside. A lady or a woman, it is all the same thing, entered, and the young gentleman never moved, although he occupied two seats, and forced her to wedge herself in on our side, where there was already a full compliment of passengers. 'Do you know that young man?' I whispered of my friend the petroleum president, whom I had noticed bowing to him. 'Oh, yes,' he replied 'he struck oil, got up a large company, and his name is Hog!' A day or two after, riding up in a Fourth Avenue car (it was a bad day and the car was jammed), when a pertly man with a red face, and carrying, it may have been a child's coffin (I wish it had been his own), or a clock case or something of that sort, crowded himself aboard, his cargo knocking off one man's hat into the mud, and hitting me a stunning blow in the face. He never apologised, but used his load as a sort of battering-ram or catapult to clear a passage for himself. A gentleman inside, who had received a blow, exchanged some harsh words with the intruder, which ended in an exchange of defiant looks and cards. I leaned over to discover the address on that of the man with the catapult, and hang me if it wasn't 'Hog!' When the storm was pretty well over, I timidly asked him if his son was not in petroleum, and was not disappointed in learning that he was, and that his appropriate sire had got a 'trading permit' in Tennessee. I saw him the other evening at the charity ball, where both he and his son kept stepping high and treading on ladies' skirts, instead of keeping their feet close to the floor and sparing the flounces. However, it is easy to distinguish the Hogs anywhere."

We presume our friend the philosopher means, by the name he uses in characterising certain inconsiderate and vulgar people, that they are porcine in taste and conduct, and not that they really bear the patronymic of Hogg. There have been very reputable people of that name, as for instance the author of "Hogg's Tales."

THE rebellion is running the usual course of unnecessary and unsuccessful insurrections. Already split up in factions, a large portion of the more deeply compromised leaders are clamoring for a dictator, with absolute powers, who shall break over all fictions of State sovereignty, and deal at will with all kinds of property, slaves included. Says the Richmond Enquirer of Feb. 25th: "These States and their cause stand in need to-day of a dictator," and it calls strenuously on some one "to seize on power with a strong hand and use it for the public safety." This temper at the Capitol is met by a hostile feeling equally determined at the South, where Governor Brown in his message to the Georgia Legislature declares:

"Our Government is now a military despotism, drifting into anarchy, and if the present policy is persisted in it must terminate in reconstruction, with or without subjugation."

Here we have a demand for the exercise of more despotic powers on one hand, and an indignant and ominous protest against those already exercised on the other. While here all factions and parties have settled down into one great Union phalanx, in the South defection, faction and anarchy hold high carnival. In these facts the world reads the issue of the struggle in which we are engaged.

WE had hoped that, with the expedition of Capt. Hall, we had had the last of Arctic Expeditions—the most unprofitable of enterprises, in which more life and money have been expended with less results than in any other field of research or adventure. But it seems that Capt. Sherrard Osborne of the British navy proposes a new expedition to the North Pole, to be fitted out with two steamers, and to occupy three summers and two winters. What commensurate return it is expected to be obtained for the proposed outlay and risk, we are not told, probably because it cannot be shown. So long as the question of a North-West passage was an open one, and there was a prospect of finding a comparatively short sailing route, available to commerce, between the North Atlantic and North Pacific, there was something plausible and rational in Arctic expeditions. That question definitely settled, however, and such scientific problems connected with the high latitudes of the continent arising incidentally disposed of, no good reason can be offered for prosecuting what are called "researches" any further. It is not of the slightest consequence if there be an open sea around the Pole or not, and the zeal, energy, endurance and money which are to be spent in determining, or attempting to determine, a good-for-nothing fact, might better be directed into fields capable of yielding practical and material as well as scientific results. Look at the region bordering on the upper waters of the great river Usumasinta in Central America, and which is absolutely unknown—a region of great material wealth undoubtedly, and certainly rich in its natural history, and occupied by a most interesting people, of whom we know next to nothing—the probable remnants of the people who built Palenque and the other Palmyras of Chiapas and Tabasco. Or look at the great terrestrial basin between the Andes and the Cordilleras of the Pacific in Peru and Bolivia. Here is a vast lake, that of Titicaca, discharging itself by a deep river into another, of which we know nothing except that it has no visible outlet. It remains to be explored and its position and form defined on our maps. What an interesting geographical problem is here to engage the attention of the curious, and give return for the money which would only be wasted among Arctic icebergs in pointless and profitless adventures.

WE hardly comprehend the vastness of our present contest. A few illustrations from history may give us a better appreciation of it. As to the number engaged, the little State of Massachusetts has furnished more men in our present struggle than fought on both sides in the great English rebellion. It has sent more men into the field than Julius Cæsar commanded to gain the empire of the world; more than all the troops of Hellas put together, in the long struggle that rent her in pieces, when her sun went down in blood. The State of New York has equipped more soldiers than all the troops of Cæsar and Pompey put together, though drawn from every province, from the Euphrates to the Pillars of Hercules. The whole army of Cromwell would only serve as skirmishers, or as a detail for a "raid" from the army of Grant or Sherman. His great military fame was gained by managing 25,000 men; and its marches and evolutions were within an area half as extensive as the State of Virginia.

The battle of Marston Moor was the most obstinately contested between "the most numerous armies that were engaged during the course of these wars;" and in that battle, as Hume laments, 50,000 troops were led to mutual slaughter. Such was the price paid; the end achieved was free government for the English race everywhere.

THE London Times has a letter from Bombay, containing a striking picture of the effects of the impulse lately given to cotton culture in that part of the world, the consequence of our civil war, which has set all the world busy in cotton production. It says: "A new trade of fifty millions of pounds a-year, yielding unheard-of profits, has been poured into the western capital of India, and society has been almost overturned. Clerks have become millionaires in a single year. The canny Scotch houses, who have for 200 years been the prominent traders of the island, have suddenly risen to the pecuniary rank of the Barings and the Pereires. The Parsees, those Jews of the far East, wealthy before, are growing great with a suddenness which has deranged even their cold intellects. The limited space upon which they live has increased to three times the value of the richest blocks in the city of London, and companies formed to steal more land out of the sea sell their shares at 1,400 per cent. upon the amount subscribed. The tide of silver rolling through Bombay has finally poured itself over the cotton land, and the peasantry, lately pauperised, find themselves suddenly rich beyond their dreams."

THE immense success of the popular loan is not without its effect on the rebel mind. We have all along taken the ground that patriotism as well as interest should impel both capitalists and laborers to subscribe to the full extent of their means. By the following from the Richmond Examiner it will be seen that the Confederates practically admit that the South will have to succumb if these subscriptions continue:

"The effort of the Yankees to sustain this explosive and inflated paper system has, so far, been marked by great ingenuity, resolution and success. Whether they will succeed in conquering the South depends in a great degree upon their continued success in upholding this paper system."

"VIRGINIA DARE," a statue, by Miss Louisa Lander, is attracting much attention in Boston. Virginia Dare was the first European born on this Continent; and when the earliest Virginian colony, planted by Sir Walter Raleigh, was swept away by the savages in 1587, this child was among the victims. The artist assumes the truth of the story that she was adopted by the aborigines, and that she grew to womanhood among them. The statue represents the young girl standing on the seashore, the water rippling about her feet, looking out over the ocean, her dim remembrance of the past striving with her fancy to picture her origin and her real relations to the beings about her.

THE great seal of the rebel States, the composition of which is by an English artist named Foley, contains, as a centre, a representation of the statue of Washington, executed by Crawford, and erected in Richmond. The figure is mounted and in uniform, as commanding in an engagement. It is surrounded by a wreath, composed of the most valuable vegetable products of the Southern soil, as tobacco, rice, maize, cotton, wheat and sugar-cane. The rim bears the legend, "The Confederate States of America, 22d February, 1862. Deo Vindice." The seal is of silver, and its diameter is from three to four inches.

THERE appears to be as large an amount of carelessness on the part of the letter-writing community in this country as in Europe. The report of Postmaster Dennisen shows that 3,580,325 dead letters were received during the past year—over 9,000 a day. Many of these letters contained money, deeds, bills of exchange, draughts, cheques, jewellery, and other valuables. Some of them were misdirected, others not directed at all, others unstamped, and others only partially directed. Thousands of these dead letters were returned to the writers, but the great majority had to be destroyed.

THE New York Medical College for Women held its Commencement Exercises in this city on the evening of the 1st inst. Diplomas were conferred on fifteen ladies, one of whom, Miss Alishy, comes from Melbourne, Australia. Addresses were made by several distinguished men and leading reformers, among them, Dr. Beecher, who said:

"He did not believe that women could become better physicians than men, but they could become good physicians for the ordinary wants of society. All that was asked was that woman should have liberty to show what she could do. She was peculiarly qualified for the sick room. Let her study faithfully, practice patiently and skilfully, relying on hard work, long continued, and her efforts will be crowned with success."

A Savannah correspondent of a Boston paper speaks as follows of the remaining population of Savannah:

"I have visited the houses of the rich and sat down in the humble homes of the negroes, and the equally mean houses of the poor whites, and have endeavored to ascertain the feelings of all. The poor whites here, as everwhere in the South, are inert and lifeless. Nothing stirs their ambition. They hover under the sunny sides of the buildings, visiting the city supply stand, to receive the contributions sent from New York and Boston. The war has taken out the best blood of that class. The bone and muscle of this element in society is decaying beneath the soil of Virginia, and what is left is the dregs of society. It never has been a controlling power, but has always been controlled by the aristocratic class, now deprived of its ancient power, and thinking not how to regain it but how to get out of the way of the colored man."

Summary of the War.

Since the commencement of the present rebellion there has been no week so devoid of military events. From Washington we learn that Gen. Sherman's advance corps has reached Fayetteville, N. C., and that the gunboats sent by Gen. Schofield had arrived at that point, which is about equidistant from Wilmington and Newberne.

It was reported through rebel sources that Gen. Sherman had burnt Columbia, in retaliation for the inhabitants firing upon the Union troops.

Gen. Johnston had assumed the command of the rebel forces in North and South Carolina, Gen Beauregard being the second in command.

Gen. Canby had returned to New Orleans from a visit of inspection to Mobile bay and the adjacent points. Mobile was still in possession of the enemy.

The armies before Richmond and Petersburg remain quiet, the rains having put the roads into such a condition as to render military operations almost impossible.

SHENANDOAH.

Deserters and refugees from Lee's lines in front of Richmond state that on last Thursday, March 2d, Gen. Sheridan captured the rebel Gen. Early and nearly his whole force, consisting of 1,800 men, between Charlottesville and Staunton. Gen. Sheridan has taken possession of both Charlottesville and Staunton. When last heard from he was at the latter place, en route, as supposed, for the important rebel town of Lynchburg, to which additional forces had been sent from Richmond to oppose him. Gen. Sheridan commenced his movement on last Monday, and during his active operations in the field Gen. Hancock will be in command of the Middle Military Department, with headquarters at Winchester, Va.

NORTH CAROLINA.

The capture in North Carolina of the entire brigade of the rebel Gen. Haygood, with the exception of one battalion, is announced by the Raleigh (N. C.) Journal. Haygood's brigade belonged to Hoke's division, and constituted a portion of the rebel force defending Wilmington till the enemy was forced to abandon that place. Neither the time nor the precise locality of the capture is given; but it is said to have occurred on the west side of Cape Fear river.

NEW BOOKS, &c.

Leaves from the Notebook of a New York Detective. New York: Dick & Fitzgerald.

A collection of short narratives, full of adventure and excitement, purporting to be from the police records, and "edited" by Dr. John B. Williams. The sort of book that always sells.

Messrs. Beadle & Co., of this city, announce a series of short orginal novels or stories, to be exclusively American in Authorship, and solicit, by circular, the opinion of the press on their plan. All we have to say is, that it is a good one. We have been doing the thing which they propose for several years in this paper, in which hardly anything appears that is not original and American. We shall continue to solicit and pay for good American stories.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—Fort Sumter was found by our forces to mount nine guns, four columbiads and five howitzers.

—— Emerson Etheridge has written a letter to the Washington papers, stating that Mr. O'Leary, the doorkeeper of the White House, was in the habit of receiving bribes to facilitate interviews with the President. An inquiry was made and he has been dismissed.

—— The New Jersey Legislative Assembly has refused, by a tie vote, to ratify the abolition amendment of the Federal Constitution.

—— Ten years ago, W. H. Seward was called a visionary for saying that Slavery must disappear from this continent, and that very probably he might live to see it.

—— It is proposed to establish an overland camel line between the Missouri frontier and the State of California, by way of Nebraska, Kansas and Colorado.

—— The effect of the war upon the population can be seen in the decrease of polls in Massachusetts during the past five years, as shown by the report of the Valuation Committee. According to this report the number of polls in Massachusetts in 1865 is 279,310. In 1860 the number was 297,222; decrease, 17,912.

—— An amendment to the Constitution of West Virginia has passed the Senate, and was certain to pass the House, disfranchising all the citizens of that State who had taken part in the rebellion.

—— The Historical Society of Savannah has been reorganized by the choice of the following officers: President, Rt. Rev. Stephen Elliott, D.D.; 1st Vice-President, John Stoddard; 2d Vice-President, Hon. Solomon Cohen; Corresponding Secretary, Hon. C. O. Jones, jun.; Recording Secretary, Easton Yonge; Treasurer, W. S. Bogart; Librarian, J. F. Cann.

—— The army hospitals in Philadelphia have 18,740 beds. Last year 50,000 patients were treated, and the number remaining, Dec. 31, was 12,417.

—— Gen. Hooker recently wrote to the ladies engaged in getting up the Chicago Sanitary Fair: "While Europe during the Crimean war produced but one Florence Nightingale, we of the young republic have such a goddess enshrined in almost every household."

—— John D. Fox, in whose house and in connection with whose family modern spirit-rapping had its origin, recently died in Wayne county, New York, aged 76 years. Though his daughters became famous as apostles of the new creed, the father never became a believer in spiritualism, but lived and died in the communion of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

—— The Tauntonian who vowed to remain unshorn until the old flag should be restored to Fort Sumter has now been relieved of his four years' beard.

—— The Nashville Union is informed that there are upwards of 100,000 bales of cotton, purchased by Government agents, now lying in the enemy's lines and waiting shipment by those who control it.

—— Col. Benjamin Harrison, of Indiana, has been made a Brigadier-General. He is a grandson of President Harrison.

—— Sunday seems a lucky day for capturing forts in North Carolina. Fort Fisher fell on Sunday, Jan. 15th, carrying with it in its fall Fort Caswell and all the works at the mouth of Cape Fear river. Just six weeks from that day Fort Anderson yielded to the combined attack of the army and navy, and the river was opened to Wilmington.

—— A novel religious service was held on the 2d of March, in Trinity Chapel, 25th street, being the celebration, by a Russian priest, of the "Divine Liturgy of the Orthodox Oriental Church." The service was in commemoration of the anniversary of the coronation of Alexander II., the present Czar, and from the present aspect of diplomatic and religious affairs between Russia and the United States the occasion possessed important political and religious significance. This was the first public worship in the form of the Russo-Greek Church in this country.

Southern.—The New York Herald correspondent and the Richmond Sentinel both ascribe the catastrophe at Wilmington railroad station, Charleston, on the 18th Feb. to boys thoughtlessly throwing small portions of gunpowder upon the burning cotton to see it blaze in the air, this communicated to a large quantity of powder stored away, and the whole exploded with terrible effect.

—— The special correspondence of the Philadelphia Press says that some rebel officers recently took two colored Union soldiers they had captured into a wood, and then amused themselves by firing at them as they would a target.

—— The Richmond editors are very emphatic in their editorials respecting the presumed or probable abandonment of Richmond, and is especially severe upon Jeff Davis and Judah Benjamin for their recent speeches, in which they both took up the ground that even the abandonment of Richmond would not materially affect the fortunes of the Southern Confederacy. The Examiner says: "Let not this fatal error be harbored till it takes root in the imagination. The evacuation of Richmond would be the loss of all respect and authority towards the Confederate Government, the disintegration of the army, and the abandonment of the scheme of an independent Southern Confederation. The war would, after that, speedily degenerate into an irregular contest, in which passion would have more to do than purpose; which would have no other object than the mere defence or present safety of those immediately persisting in it. The hope of establishing a Confederacy and securing its recognition among nations would be gone for ever. The common sense of the country, the instinct of every man and woman in the land, contradicts the idea that any possibility of an independent South would remain after its capital was abandoned, its Government set adrift, and its army withdrawn into the solitudes of the interior." The Enquirer has a most bitter article, denouncing the Congressmen, who have been abandoning Richmond "one by one, till now few remain." It adds that Gen. Lee demands their return, and if they will not come back it advises that a law shall be passed rendering them liable to the same punishment as deserters, viz., death. The Richmond Sentinel advises that every non-combatant be ordered to leave Richmond, except the Members of Congress and other officials, not because there is danger of the city being captured, but to save provisions, and to leave more space for the heroic defenders.

—— As though by a curious retribution, the troops who first marched into Charleston were a colored regiment, and shortly afterwards a Massachusetts regiment entered singing the well-known song of "John Brown's Body is mouldering in the Grave."

Military.—Since the 15th day of last Dec. our captures of artillery from the rebellion, field and siege pieces, brass, iron and steel, smooth bores and rifles, American and English manufacture, of all sorts and sizes, from the little howitzer of a flying cavalry squadron to the ponderous, mahogany-mounted Armstrong guns of Forts Fisher and Caswell, have been about as follows:

	Guns Captured.
By Gen. Thomas from the rebel Gen. Hood in the late Nashville campaign	60
By Gen. Sherman at Savannah	160
By Gens. Terry and Schofield and Admiral Porter in Cape Fear river defences	175
By Gen. Gillmore at Charleston	450
Total	845

Nor is this all, for including the cannon lost by the enemy in the blowing up of their ironclads in the Savannah river, Charleston harbor and Cape Fear river, their aggregate losses are something over 900 cannon.

Personal.—The will of the late James W. Wallack has been admitted to probate in the Surrogate's Court in this city. It divides his estate between his two sons, John Lester Wallack, the actor, and Captain Henry Wallack, of the British army, the theatre being included in the portion of the former.

—— Stephen Massett, "Jeemes Pipes of Pipesville," is "trampesing" through Connecticut, giving his entertainments. He is reading with great eclat, "The Vagabonds," "Beautiful Snow," etc. If we were to judge by what the "rural press" says, he has met with a great success.

—— Miss Harriet Lane, the former lady of the White House, is now in Washington, on a visit to Madame Berghman, wife of the Minister from Belgium.

—— The two sons of Burns, the poet, are colonels in the British army. Their ages are 71 and 73.

—— The rebel Congressman Foote, before he sailed for Europe, said to an old New York political friend of his, that at a secret session of the rebel Congress it was acknowledged that the war for independence was a failure.

—— Female lecturers are on the increase. Miss Emma Hardinge has announced a lecture at the Cooper Institute, called "A Voice to the American People."

—— Gail Hamilton, whom the London Times treats as a gentleman, is a lady named Abigail Hamilton.

—— Major-Gens. Crook and Kelly, who were recently captured at Cumberland by a rebel force, have been committed to Libey prison, Richmond.

—— Gen. McClellan, during his stay in England, was invited to a grand dinner at Claremont, where he met the entire Orleans family, numbering 22 persons.

Obituary.—Cardinal Wiseman died in London on the 15th of Feb., after a long illness, borne with great fortitude. He was born in Spain, of English parents, but had resided in England the greater part of his life. He was a man of great learning and moderation.

—— Hon. Eli Cook died Feb. 27. He was born 1814. He was the leading criminal lawyer of New York, and had been in partnership with Judge Davis and the rebel Gen. Buckner. He was an active politician.

—— Canadian papers announce the death of the Hon. Geo. Moffatt, in Montreal, in his 78th year. He was born in the North of England, and went to Canada in his 13th year. He was a good man, an influential politician and an honorable merchant.

—— The Italian journals announce the death of the poet Felice Romani, author of the libretti of Norma and Sonnambula.

—— Gov. William Cannon, of Delaware, died 1st of March, after a short illness. The last act of his public career was a letter to the Delaware Legislature, urging the ratification of the Constitutional Amendment.

—— Col. Nicholas Smith, died at Utica, N. Y., on Feb. 26, at the age of 87. He was the oldest inhabitant, having been a resident of the place 16 years longer than any person known. His father and mother were scalped and murdered by the Indians. He moved with his uncle to Utica in 1788, and lived four months in a hut made of the branches of trees, while their house was being constructed—the house being the first frame building put up in Utica. He served in the war of 1812.

Foreign.—Mr. Henry Coleman, Blondin's treasurer, came up in the London Bankruptcy Court lately. He owes Blondin $60,000, which the latter had lent him. Blondin's real name is Jean François Gravelet.

—— Spain is about recognising the new kingdom of Italy. The relations between the Papal Court and the Spanish Ministry are not at all cordial. Hitherto they have always been on the best of terms.

—— The Empress Eugenie has just lost a lawsuit which has been in progress for several years in the Supreme Court of Madrid. The Empress claimed the countess-ship of Miranda and the vast estates attached to that ancient title, her right to which has been successfully disputed by the Malpica family.

—— The Pope intends to create a new department in the museum of the Vatican, to be entirely devoted to bronze statues.

—— The Journal du Havre says: "The marriage of Mademoiselle Patti with a Russian gentleman has been announced. This alliance, which is to take place at an early day, will eventuate in the loss of that celebrated cantatrice to the stage."

—— The finder of the recently discovered statue of Hercules, at Rome, presented it to the Pope, who allotted him a pension of 2,500 crowns, and presented him with a gold snuff-box, in which was not snuff, but 1,000 gold crowns enveloped in a title deed, conferring the title of Marquis on himself and his descendants.

—— A new periodical is to be published at Rome, to be called the Journal of the Immaculate Conception; and as a premium to subscribers a month's indulgence is promised.

—— There is to be another Universal Exhibition at Paris in 1867. Prince Napoleon will be at the head of it. A new structure will be built, probably on the Champ-de-Mars; that now existing on the Champs Elysées, and used for the exhibition of 1855, being deemed too small.

—— The oil wells in Burmah, it is estimated, have been yielding their present supply of 800,000 barrels per annum at least 100 years, amounting during that period to about 80,000,000 barrels English measure; these, if arranged as previously stated, would form a continuous line of oil barrels 27,300 miles long. Oil wells also exist in Persia, and it is said have lately been discovered near the Sea of Azof, while on the island of Samos they existed 500 years before the Christian era.

Chit-Chat.—The Press, in noticing the argument of the New York Independent in favor of women voting, suggests that the Independent should begin with the churches, which do not allow their women to vote yet.

—— A Troy alderman got married the other day and had rather a thrilling time on his wedding tour. He was two days in getting to Buffalo on account of the snow, was in the American Hotel in that city when it burned down, and on his way to Chicago was thrown over an embankment 20 feet high by a railroad accident, badly bruising him and his new wife. The couple are now in Chicago, recovering from their injuries and getting courage to try the return trip. A country paper in quoting the above, adds: "How true it is that the way of the transgressor is hard!"

—— A Philadelphia paper says the ladies of that city have introduced a new custom likely to be popular. They are sending anonymously to their gentleman acquaintances small pies and tarts, enveloped in white tissue paper, like wedding cake. The meaning of this curious innovation is yet a mystery.

—— Some very valuable old works have been discovered in the old convents of Mexico.

—— In consequence of the high price of female attire, it is now the fashion to give calico balls in Maine.

THE SECOND INAUGURATION OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN.

This important event took place on Saturday, the 4th of March, at the Capitol in Washington. In many respects it is the most emphatic ceremonial in the history of our republic, since it solemnly pledges the nation in the face of the world to restore the Union whatever the cost may be. Notwithstanding the showers of rain that fell the attendance was immense, and the procession of great magnitude and state. It formed on 16th street, near Pennsylvania avenue, shortly before eleven, and directly after commenced moving towards the Capitol. The military escort consisted of two regiments of the Invalid Corps, a squadron of cavalry, a battery of artillery, four companies of colored troops, and several bands of music. The line of march was decorated with flags, and the windows along the route were crowded with spectators, who manifested the utmost enthusiasm. The streets, however, were in a miserable condition, consequent on the rain of the morning, which slackened about eight o'clock, and entirely ceased about eleven. The procession was over a mile in length. The President was in the Capitol busily engaged in signing bills. A few minutes before twelve the official procession began to file into the Senate Chamber. First came the members of the Supreme Court; soon after Mr. Lincoln entered, accompanied by Vice-President Hamlin, the members of the Cabinet, the Diplomatic Corps, officers of the army and navy. After Vice-President Hamlin had bidden farewell to the Senate as its presiding officer, the oath of office as Vice-President was then administered to Mr. Johnson, and the Senators elect of the 39th Congress were then sworn in, after which the official procession was formed and proceeded to the platform in front of the portico of the eastern face of the Capitol, where the ceremony of the inauguration of the President-Elect was concluded. The appearance of Mr. Lincoln was the signal for a tremendous outburst of enthusiastic cheers. When this tumult subsided, the President stepped forward and delivered his inaugural address. At the conclusion of these proceedings the procession was reformed, and the President was escorted to the White House.

It is estimated that over 30,000 persons were present, notwithstanding the depth of mud in which they were obliged to stand.

SLEIGHING IN RUSSIA.

Talking about the Russians, a few words about their favorite manner of sleighing ought not to be uninteresting in this connection. They do not use horses, for the simple reason that their sleighing is confined to rapid descents and ascents of ice hills, upon which quadrupeds and bipeds could have no chance of figuring.

An authority on the subject furnishes the following description: Two strong wooden towers, about 50 feet high, are erected nearly opposite to but at a distance of several hundred feet from each other. A commodious flight of steps at the back of each leads to the summit, from which an inclined plane at the shortest possible angle, formed of immense blocks of ice, cemented together by water poured into the interstices, leads to the bottom or plane, which continues on a bed of similar blocks of ice, protected at the sides with little embankments of snow to the end of the ground. Parties thus descend one hill, and by the impetus acquired arrive rapidly at the end of the run, where they leave their sledges, which are carried by men employed for the purpose, to the top of the other tower, when they again launch off. To the uninitiated this is rather hazardous sport, and every beginner has to pay his footing at the expense of some severe falls; for the least deviation from the true line, particularly descending the slope, when the speed is terrific, sends the sledge and its occupant headlong and whirling after each other in utter helplessness. The management of the sledge is, however, so simple that a few turns are sufficient to master it. The sledge is a slight framework of steel, about one foot high and three feet long, having a cushion on the top for the seat.

The rider places himself at the extremity, with his legs advanced before him, and his hands, protected by strong gloves, touching the ice on either side, but rather behind him. These act as the rudder, for the slightest touch is sufficient to regulate the direction of the sledge, even at its utmost speed. An adept takes charge of a lady, who sits between his legs, and away they dash. But I have seen some ladies kneel, and even stand on the sledge behind the gentlemen, and perform the descent without the slightest risk, although the speed cannot be less than 30 miles an hour. To the ladies this is a most agreeable and healthy resort, and the exercise is almost necessary, for the intense cold would render the ordinary recreation of walking hardly endurable. To make 20 descents it is necessary to mount 2,000 steps, being 50 for each tower, which is of itself a good day's work. The exciting sensation occasioned by the speed, and the uncontrolled headlong impetus of the sledge, will not admit of a description. It is, however, of that pleasurable nature that the anxiety to enjoy it is ever on the increase.

Among other amusements of the season, the English residents have started an ice boat, in which they make excursions to Cronstadt and other spots in the Gulf of Finland. In fact, the ice is traversed in all directions to these places by sledges; but an extraordinary lookout is kept, and little huts for the Custom House officers are thickly planted about to prevent smuggling. From this description we leave our readers to infer whether the Russian or American plan is the most agreeable. For our own part we prefer the American, as being more natural and more safe, though, perhaps, less exciting.

VOLTAIRE'S HEART.

The evening Moniteur gives the following account of the translation of the heart of Voltaire to the Bibliotheque Imperiale, which event has provoked commentaries of the most diverse kinds:

"When Voltaire died his heart, after a post-mortem examination, was extracted from his body on May 31, 1778, by order of the Marquis de Villette, in whose house he stayed after his return to Paris, and wherein he died. The friend, the admirer of the great writer, desired to save his heart from the destruction which death occasions, and it was placed in a metallic vessel and steeped in a chemical preparation calculated to preserve it from decay. When, in the execution of the law of May 30, 1791, which enacted that 'the ashes of Voltaire should be transferred to the church of St. Genevieve, where they should receive the funeral honors due to great men,' the funeral procession of Voltaire passed through the streets of Paris on July 11 of the same year, a halt was made before the mansion of the Marquis de Villette, situated at the corner of the Rue de Beaune and the Quai Voltaire, and the Moniteur of July 13 records the fact that the reason for the pause was that Voltaire's heart was there. Shortly afterwards the heart was removed to the Chateau de Villette, in the arrondissement of Pont Saint Maxence (Oise), where it ever since remained, and was kept with veneration.

"But the Marquis de Villette, his widow, and his son are dead; and their heirs having considered it a duty to give up this relic to the state, M. Leon Duval, a member of the order of Advocates of the Imperial Court of Paris, having taken the Emperor's pleasure, his Majesty desired that a national asylum should be given in the Bibliotheque Imperiale to the heart of Voltaire, to the end that it may henceforth belong to France, pursuant to the intent of the law of May 30, 1791. In obedience to his Majesty's orders, on Friday last, the 16th of this month, M. Duruy, the Minister of Public Instruction, proceeded to the Bibliotheque Imperiale, and there, in the presence of the Administrator-General of the establishment, accompanied by members of the Consultative Committee, he received from the hands of M. Leon Duval the heart of Voltaire, inclosed in a recipient of gilt metal, on which is engraved these words:

'Le cœur de Voltaire, mort à Paris le XXX Mai, MDCCLXXVIII.'

"The Minister declared that he took possession of this precious deposit, and ordered that it should be provisionally kept, with all the respect due to the mortal remains of this great man, in the best part of the Bibliotheque Imperiale—that is to say, the department of medals—until the time when the new works shall be sufficiently advanced to permit of its definitive installation between the departments of manuscripts and prints, on the first floor of the Rotunda, between the junction of the Rues de Richelieu and Neuve des Petits Champs, where a room is destined to receive not only the heart of Voltaire, but also the original statue by Houdon, the medals struck in his honor, and the manuscript correspondence and printed works of the immortal writer. Proces verbal (i.e. a written record) was at once drawn up of this delivery and reception."

Joseph Bonaparte and the Crown of Mexico.—It may not be forgotten that a member of the Bonaparte family was offered 40 years ago the crown of Mexico. The story is told by the Emperor himself in his sketch of Joseph, eldest brother of the first Napoleon: "While Joseph was living, as a philosopher, on the banks of the Delaware, thinking of nothing but of doing good to those around him, he received a proposal which surprised and touched him. A deputation of Mexicans came to him to place at his disposal the crown of Mexico. The ex-King of Naples and Spain answered the deputation nearly in these terms: 'I have borne two crowns, and I would not take a single step for a third. Nothing can be more flattering to me than to see men who, when I was in Madrid, refused to recognise my authority, come now in my exile to ask of me to put myself at their head. But I do not believe that the throne you wish to raise up can make you happy; and every day I spend on the hospitable soil of the United States proves to me more and more the excellence of Republican institutions for America. Preserve them, then, as the precious gifts of Providence. Put an end to your intestine quarrels; imitate the United States, and look out among your fellow-citizens for one more capable than I am to play the great part of Washington.'"

Egyptian Cotton.—Advices from Egypt state that notwithstanding the reaction in the cotton market the prospects of the country continue steadily to improve, owing to the judicious exertions of the Viceroy for the development of its resources by all modern aid. Since Nubar Pasha has been appointed Minister of Public Works and Commerce, he has also had the railway under his control, and goods are now forwarded with rapidity—so much so, indeed, that the merchants complain that too much cotton is accumulating at Alexandria, where the large holders are waiting for better prices to realise. This latter circumstance accounts for the rate of exchange remaining higher than is usual at the present period of the year, the quotation now being 95 to 95½, so that not much gold is imported—a state of affairs expected to continue for some weeks, as the demand for bills will be considerable on account of large imports of all kinds having to be paid for as well as various debts from Egypt to Europe having to be liquidated.

A Wisconsin paper says that the oldest man in the world is now living in Caledonia, in that State. His name is Joseph Crele, and his age is 139 years. He has lived in Wisconsin more than a century, and was first married in New Orleans 109 years ago. Some years afterwards he settled at Prairie du Chien, while Wisconsin was yet a province of France. Before the Revolutionary War, he was employed to carry letters between Prairie du Chien and Green Bay. It is but a few years ago that he was called as a witness in the Circuit Court, in a case involving the title to certain real estate at Prairie du Chien, to give testimony in relation to events that transpired 80 years before.

SCENES IN SAVANNAH, GA.

Broad Street, etc.

We give in our present number some sketches of the streets of this beautiful city — for few Southern towns are equal the great seaport of Georgia, either at natural beauty of location or richness of arrangement. The streets are very wide, but they are nicely and well paved. At every corner is a public square, which might be called squares, were they not generally of an oval shape—those being planded with the pride of India free have a very pleasant look. The number of those squares is 24. Broad street has a grassy promenade in the middle, with carriage ways on either side. Many of the houses are very handsome, and built of brick. Liberty street is also a very handsome street. We present views of both Liberty and Broad streets.

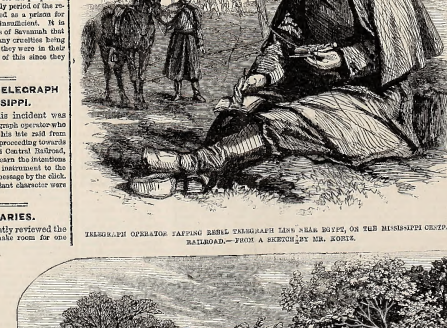
Contrabands on the March.

It was a most suggestive sight, the train of contrabands, who gathered as our army marched along, "like a black snowball," as the genial Mr. Osborne of the N. Y. Herald termed the conglomerated mass of humanity who had been suddenly converted from slaves to freemen by the mere echo of Sherman's trend. The shameless men who advocate so inhuman a system as slavery should have seen the wretched and pitiful exhibition of sable brotherhood as they dragged their wearied wives and little ones along with them. The oft expressed fallacy that they preferred slavery to freedom would have been "quashed to earth," as Bryant says ever was, never to rise again. Helper, his transcendental book, which, like the trumpet of Scripture, blew the walls of Jericho down, has truly said:

"It is not alone on account of the negroes that I hold the cause of slavery, but also by reason of the degradation it has entailed upon the white race. As a white man myself, and as a former slaveowner, I denounce the system as entailing the most horrible curse upon the superior race."



The American people have made up their minds upon the subject, and nothing can now restore the foul stain of slavery on this continent.

The Hospital.

The hospital is a commodious building, and is now occupied by our sick and wounded soldiers. It is built in the usual low Southern style of architecture, but it is pleasantly situated, and well adapted for the purpose to which it is devoted. During the early period of the rebellion part of the building was used as a prison for Union troops, when the jail was insufficient. It is something in favor of the inhabitants of Savannah that we have an authentic account of any cruelties being practiced upon the prisoners while they were in their charge. They have felt the benefit of this since they have been restored to the old flag.

TAPPING A REBEL TELEGRAPH LINE IN MISSISSIPPI.

The sketch from which this incident was taken is sent us by Mr. Davis, a telegraph operator who acted as clerk to Gen. Grierson in his late raid from Memphis into Mississippi. While proceeding towards Kenyon on the line of the Mississippi Central Railroad, the practised operator could easily learn the intentions of the rebels, by attaching a pocket instrument to the telegraph wire, and reading of the message by the click. Some dispatches of a highly important character were thus nearly intercepted.

MADMEN'S VAGARIES.

The London Times has recently reviewed the report of a Lunatic Asylum—we make room for one extract:

It requires great care and constant watchfulness to keep these men from instruments with which to injure the keepers or each other. Their stringgrowled is carefully tended of large silence, yet the man G., a short time back, persuaded his comrades to collect small pebbles, with which he filled the locks of the doors, so that the warders could not open them, while he and others used their firms as battering-rams to batt away the bars of the windows, and so succeeded in escaping into the court below.

Over the walls of this, however, they could not pass, and there, with characteristic audacity, they submitted at once to the captivity which one or two warders reimposed upon them. Into the refractory wards of this "strong block" never less than three wardens told to struggle with the inmate. As an instance of the violence which has to be exercised over these, the more dangerous of the dangerous class of criminal lunatics, we may mention one story of the man F., who, though generally sensible enough, is on the whole a very dangerous man, and one subject to frequent and uncertain fits of bestial cold madness. One day when Dr. Meyer was going his rounds, a patient told him, as they all will tell like children upon one another, that F. had got a knife. He had not seen it, but he was sure from his mutterings and other signs that F. had got it, and was likely to use it. This was alarming news of such a lunatic as F., to Dr. Meyer, with the warders, went at once to his cell.

"Mr. F.," said Dr. Meyer, "I am told you have got a knife."

F., of course, was utterly surprised at this intimation. Where could he get a knife? It was against the rules to have a knife, and he of course would never break them—not he. This was part of the persecution he had been subjected to throughout life. There his cell was often locked up with madmen, etc.

"Very well," said Dr. Meyer, "that at least you must let me search your cell, and see."

Away went F. with the doctor and warders to a refractory cell, where F. was stripped of all his clothes, a new suit given him, and the old ones searched. No knife was found. A fresh inquiry was made, and the information as to a knife in F.'s possession became clearer and more explicit still. So Dr. Meyer returned to F.'s cell, and told him that after his examination of his clothes, he felt quite sure that he had not a knife.

"But still, Dr. F.," he added, "as every one reports to me that you have got a knife, and that it quite agrees in the rules of the establishment, here in this refractory cell you will have to stay, without tobacco, until you find a knife. Think about it, therefore, if you know of any place where a knife may be found, and then let me know, and I will release you instantly."

Of course, F. protested. It was very hard to be made answerable for falsehoods or brutality. But as long as it possible that, shut up there, he could find a knife? If Dr. Meyer would only tell him where they were kept, he would go a dozen cheerfully, but otherwise how could he? And so on, day by day, as Dr. Meyer came to see him.

A week thus passed away, and then F., becoming tired of his confinement, began to relax a little, and at last told Dr. Meyer that if he would come alone to his cell, he would show him something—not a knife, of cell, but what he knew he had not got, but still there course—that they knew he had not got, but still there was something to be seen. To this most unwitting proposition Dr. Meyer of course declined to assent. "Unless Dr. F. had a knife in his cell must be shown to Dr. Meyer accompanied by his warders, from the to the apartment again full through, till nearly a fortnight elapsed, when at last F. evidently gave in, and went with the warders to Dr. Meyer's cell. Arrived here, he marched Dr. Meyer to the corner, took out some fifty one of the fixtures in the boards, which fitted fully one of the fixtures in the boards, which fitted fully into its hole like a cork, and which when removed gave a little spot of access to the space between the floor and ceiling beneath. F. then produced from an obscure corner of his cell a piece of thin cotton, to which was attached a pin bent like a hook, and dropping this into a bottle, got a long piece of very tenacious catch-worm-like thing, which Dr. Meyer and the warders stood gazing at in wondering. At last it appeared, and he successful, and he hooked up a thread of wonderful strength for his size, and then set suddenly down upon the floor. That was all he had to show. Dr. Meyer, however, examining the thread found out the thread through the hole, and lo! Attached to it was a knife, pointed and sharpened to the keenness of a razor!

THE MOTIVES AND GROWTH OF WAR.—The law of war between nations—a law illustrated in every page of history—appears to be this: that wars are few or frequent in proportion to the destructive powers of the arms in use. When the club was the only weapon of attack and defence, there was no peace; every brave and his only and club-law war versus. When the bow owned and bladder took its place, war came and went with the season. As soon as the harvest was over the Romans went out against his neighbor or his neighbor advanced against him. Gunpowder was a great peacemaker. If with that invention war became more destructive, it ceased to be the normal condition of mankind. It grew more and more terrible, more and more brief. Nations fell how great the loss might be of a battalion, and statesmen began to ask themselves if the possible gain would equal the inevitable loss. Industry, passion, ignorance, personal cupidity, often overleaped the bounds of reason, and intrigue, all these made forever but the violence never failed to obtain the expression of public opinion—the brutal instrument of the ruler, however powerful, can dispense with the moral support of public opinion; and hence, however warlike, the most passionate lover of war will hesitate long and resort to a thousand tricks, ay Bonaparte always did, rather than appear as the open enemy or, the wilful shedder of blood.

Galignani's Messenger says that an apothecary at Nantes has just discovered, by the merest accident, that ammonia will put out fires. It happened to have about 10 litres of ammonia in the cellar, and his boy, in going down carelessly with a light, had set fire to it. Assistance was speedily at hand, and pail after pail of water was being poured into the cellar without producing any effect, when the apothecary himself took up a pail which was standing neglected in a corner, emptied the contents into the cellar, to the astonishment the flames were quenched as if by magic, and upon examination he found that the pail, which belonged to his laboratory, had contained a quantity of liquid ammonia. The result is easy to explain on scientific principles, for ammonia, which consists of 81 parts of nitrogen and 18 of hydrogen, is easily decomposed by heat, and the nitrogen thus set free in the midst of a conflagration must infallibly put out the flames.

THE LAST SCENE.

BY WILLIAM WINTER.

Hear she lieth, white and chill;
Put your hand upon her brow;
Still her heart is—very still,
And she does not know you now.

Ah! the grave's a quiet bed,
She shall sleep a pleasant sleep;
And the tears that you may shed
Will not wake her—therefore, weep!

Weep! for you have wrought her woe;
Mourn—she mourned and died for you;
Ah! too late we come to know
What is false, and what is true.

NOBLESSE OBLICE.

CHAPTER I.

"What is it, Olivia?"

"What is what?" Olivia returned, in a petulant, evasive manner.

John Garth, who was a connection in the family, enough of a cousin to give him a certain cousinly privilege, bent forward and drew his finger down the great wrinkle that Olivia Ruthermayne had frowned into her fair forehead.

Olivia laughed a little at this indication, and, hesitating a moment, said, with a peculiar curving of the neck which belonged to all the Ruthermaynes:

"I've been so annoyed at the Fair rooms this morning."

"Eh, who annoyed you?" asked John.

She once again curved that white stately throat of hers, as she replied:

"Mrs. Lowndes would nominate that Miss Morrison, and actually managed it so that she will act specially with me on the committee—you know I was chosen last week as one of the committee—and what is more provoking than all, she stands with me at my table," emphasizing the "my" with a true Ruthermayne appropriation.

"Who is that Miss Morrison?"

"Oh, don't you know? The daughter of a brewer, or baker, or candlestick-maker, something of that sort, who made a little fortune and bought Cliff Cottage of the Ludlows. Such a sacrilege—that lovely place falling out of those splendid Ludlows' hands into such people's possession as those Morrisons."

John Garth laughed. Then, in a good-humored, hankering tone:

"Olivia, do you know what calling our ancestor, Erastus Ruthermayne, followed? How John Garth's eyes twinkled here. 'No? you don't know? It was an honest calling, Olivia. You remember the barber-surgeon who blotted the Newcome escutcheon; yes, and I dare say you laughed merrily over it. Well, Olivia, we certainly might paint a razor on our coat of arms if we choose—a razor without the scalpel, Olivia. So we are in a worse plight than the Newcomes. Fancy the gay tricolored pole woven in with the rest."

Olivia rose up stateller than ever, scarlet with passion, though her words came cold enough.

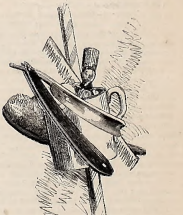
"Why do you wish to say such things, John? I think it worse than unkind such jesting."

"Olivia, I was not jesting."

"You don't mean that——"

"Yes; I do mean that our ancestor was a barber, Olivia. Thank heaven that he was a kind and honest gentleman, who followed an honest calling without shame, and did some good deeds in his day, for the family chronicle says: 'He was a God-fearing man, who gave unto the needy.'"

Olivia Ruthermayne burst into tears. She was not touched by the reminiscences of the departed Erastus's piety, but instead her haughty heart, which was brimful, like many another's, of pride and vanity, received a mortal thrust from this barber's long since rusty rapier.



John Garth, who had raised all this commotion by his unhappy ill-diligence, looked remorseful now.

"I am a clumsy fellow," he thought. "I suppose she has a romantic sentiment about the question of ancestry; and I must needs suppose that she had the pitiful vanity of a snob."

And so, melted by these tears, he said, gruffly:

"I dare say I have made a mistake in telling you, Olivia, in the way I did. I recognise as much as you that the poetic sentiment of fine ancestry is lawful and good; but what I fight against is the vanity that makes it a boast and a bulwark, because it is utterly futile to make it thy one or the other, subject as we are to a Power who can make the descendants of a race what he pleases for His divine purposes. And if I spoke with malice intent,' Olivia, thinking you were viewing it unjustly and narrowly, I am sure I beg your pardon."

Olivia pinched up through her tears in amazement at John Garth—gay John Garth—whom she had never heard talk in such serious strain before. She was mollified at being put, even by supposition, upon such heroic ground, and so the quarrel ended for the time, and Olivia listened in a softer mood to this gay John Garth's continued gravity of talk, and liked him better than she knew. And John, in this softer mood, found her more charming than ever, and reproached himself for his injustice to her. And all the while, out of sight, that one vulnerable spot of vanity was smarting as keenly as ever. If he had said to her:

"Olivia, the Ruthermaynes were a great race. They were harsh to their dependents, they were imperious to their equals, and faithless to women, through years of uninterrupted prosperity, for the Ruthermaynes have been from time immemorial, Olivia, the lords of the land;" if he had said this to her, Olivia would have felt no shame. Rather, she would have gloried in the long line of Ruthermaynes, who had been lords of the land from time immemorial; and if she had thought of their cruelty, their faithlessness, it would have seemed only so much more the sign of their feudal origin, for she remembered

"How feudal barons, over sea and land, Swore from their spoils, ruled with a mighty hand."

And as she thought, very likely, that handsome head of hers would have lifted itself a little higher than usual, and her step would have been statelier than ever with the burden of this dark old name upon her; whereas now, through her love for Governors and other grand personages, who had borne the patronymic of Ruthermayne, there was that vulgar tricolored emblem to thrust glaringly between the ancient shirt-ruffles, the powdered wigs, and the silver knee-buckles of the gentry. Alas! for the fair Olivia, the savor of the plone Ersehn's life was as gall and wormwood to her.

CHAPTER II.

JOHN GARTH pushed patiently on through the crowd, with a view to hut one thing for the moment,—to find his way to the stall where his cousin Olivia had a place. He was standing wedged in between almost of people, when about a dozen of some one said:

"There is Olivia Ruthermayne."

"Where?"

"Under the crossed flags, and she looks like a born princess."

John Garth, too, followed this direction, and saw Olivia speaking to a group before her, with the gracious air that set so well upon her, and made her look indeed like a born princess, for Olivia by nature had that high imperious stamp about her from the Ruthermayne curve of the neck to the slender poise of her whole figure.

As he looked the speaker at his ear said again, in answer to some question:

"No, I have only a slight acquaintance with her; but she seems to me a royal creature. She comes of fine old stock, I am told; and she certainly does not belie it. I never meet her on the street but I want to say, as I raise my hat to her youth and loveliness: "Noblesse oblige!""

Garth turned quickly to see this speaker, who spoke so kindly of Olivia. He recognized him as a quiet, middle-aged man, whose face he had seen now and then at a party, but more frequently connecting with some of letters and articles, which seemed most at home. He knew him to be one whose opinions were valued; and he felt a thrill of satisfaction at his praise of Olivia. Yes, of course she was all this. What injustice he had done her last night! He had not waited to hear the whole. If he had, no doubt he would have found that "that Miss Morrison" was in herself an undesirable companion; some showy, loudtalking girl, whose manners were a travesty of her social breeding, and who was only made more obnoxious by the importance of money. And what haste he had been to prove Olivia a snob. He could have asked her pardon now; and indeed if it was not on his lips, it was in the warm glance of his eyes as he bowed over her table and greeted her. There were many lovely girls in that vicinity, but certainly Olivia was the queen of them all. There were the three Lidlow girls, one or two whom he didn't know, but there was no Miss Morrison; and he felt quite relieved at this absence. Olivia's table, on one straight his glance as he stood thinking of her thus, and looking at her; and something in it made her "color come;" and she smiled a quick, involuntary smile of pleasure. Who was there like John Garth? If he loved her—at the half thought she drew in her breath, and sent it out in a soft sigh of delight.

Some one else caught these glances—this smile and blush—and straightway

"It will be a match between John Garth and Olivia Ruthermayne."

"Eh! who told you so?"

"I read it just now in their faces."

A laugh, and the talkers passed on; unaware that John Garth overheard. John Garth and gentlemen—only he just then, unemployed in her stall, was binding up a trellis of lavish garland the flagstaff at the end of the table. He saw she was regarding Olivia Ruthermayne with intense interest through the leaves of floral. And presently her eyes came to him. She flushed as she found herself observed, and the momentary confusion made her lose hold upon the vine; it came tumbling about her head; and John Garth immediately adored the vivacious aid he needed. Leaves and garlands clung in her hair, and in the disentanglement there would have been embarrassment if John had not taken it gaily, and the lady so simply. She busied herself wondered at the unruffled serenity that evinced itself in her manner. She was seemingly no more stirred than a child, and she was relieved at first from its burden was cool and undashed, and the "thank you" came quietly and naturally, as if to a page, pale, lightly looking face, and as he caught a second look at it, he decided that she was a Lodlow. She had the Lodlow expression, and just their trained self-possession.

"After all," he thought, "there is something in blood. A child may feed grit would have fidgeted and flushed, or giggled and fluttered, and made eyes at such a coudrelenpa."

Behind the table, as they stood, no one was much the wiser for this coudrelenpa curiosity Olivia knew nothing of it, for when he turned the corner again she said quietly, "I don't know have you been? I missed you," in her sweetest tone.

There was a charm about Olivia and her table that night; and he discovered now, standing her with curious questions at his heart. And once or twice, so before, he caught other eyes watching him; those calm, grey eyes of the unknown Lodlow. The expression haunted him, and riding home with Olivia, he asked about her.

"That pale girl with the lovely hair, dark eyes, and the highbred air, wasn't she a Lodlow?"

"Yes," answered Olivia, "own cousin to Ellinor Lidlow, but I didn't think her like them. She is pale, like Ellinor, and has large eyes, but I fancied her manner was fussy."

John thought of the cool face, the quiet air, under the falling laurel.

"And Miss Morrison?" he inquired.

"Oh, of course we can't associate with her. She's a very nice sort of a girl in her way, I don't doubt; and after this is over I shall have no more to do with her, for we shall never come together in society."

A little of the princess royal air, but still it was not unkindly said, and Olivia had a better knowledge of the question than he had.

He bade her good-night, and as she entered the door, her head turned over her shoulder, her eyes, her lips smiling, he thought how much he admired her beyond any other woman.

For the two or three days following he did not see her; away on business, the fair ended without him, and the day he returned Olivia told him readily of its specific, and would he go down to the hall with her and help her out with those horrid last settlements?

He went down to the hall, now bare of its lovely furnishings, and altogether desolate but for the fair occupants who formed the committee; and he helped Olivia with the "horrid accounts," and admired her patience, her gracious urbanity, to some who must have been irksome to her; and wondered which of those long-talking, long-dressing girls was Miss Morrison; and contrasting them to Olivia, said to himself, "Noblesse oblige!" and asked her pardon silently for his previous judgment. He was talking to Ellinor Lidlow, and looking at Olivia, when again he met the eyes of the Lidlow cousin regarding him speculatively.

"I know your cousin at once the other night," he said, "from her resemblance to your family."

"Clarice? is it possible? We thought Clarice rather a black sheep among us," replied Ellinor, laughing. "She has such a dark brunette skin, you know, and we are all pale blondes."

"Dark—do you call her dark?" said Garth, in surprise.

She followed the direction of his eyes, and was enlightened.

"Oh, no, I don't call that lady dark, Mr. Garth. She isn't my cousin;" and Ellinor laughed in amusement.

"Not your cousin? Who, then?"

"Miss Morrison."

John Garth got a shock of electricity. He felt it to his finger's ends. "So much for my riper conclusions," he said to himself. "Blood will show it's self, and the Lidlow cool insolence where he pleases, and confounds our straight lines."

He saw Olivia talking with Miss Morrison, noted the gracious politeness of his cousin, and was pleased.

"Clarice can tell a lady," he thought. "She has found this one out at last."

He drew nearer to them, and what do you think he heard? Why, Miss Morrison in the commonest, pending between them in their capacity as committee were first settled, and Miss Morrison had been so good as to offer assistance to the members of the Fair, how pleasant it had been, etc., when Olivia, putting out her hand, put on her Statefest manner, and in a decisive tone took formal leave of her official companion; bade her adieu as if their places were so far apart, or as if she designed to put them by this action so far apart that further juxtaposition was out of the question. John Garth's manly cheek blushed with shame; and a sense of humiliation and indignant anger rose up within him.

"So," he almost exclaimed aloud, "Olivia Ruthermayne's fine courtesy is insulting condescension sometimes."

He looked at Miss Morrison at this. The pale, delicate face had lost nothing of its refinement; there was no flush of anger, a half scornful smile upon her lips, which evinced her understanding; but of too retined and sensitive a nature to give way to any other sign of hurt.

"Olivia's poor ay day," thought Garth, glancing at the agate in his cousin, whose color had fallen somewhat at the open, deliberate slight which met her. John's temper was fully roused; he felt as Olivia had done, that blood, one of his blood should make amends. With this feeling he caught Ellinor Lidlow as she passed by him.

"Ellinor, give me an introduction to Miss Morrison."

Ellinor looked half-wonderingly at Olivia standing so near John, and comprehend, and he did not explain, and in a moment Ellinor was saying:

"Mr. Garth wants to know you, Miss Morrison. Miss Morrison, Mr. Garth."

And John Garth began to talk cordially and genially, referring to their previous meeting, air and words denoting respectful deference as a gentleman can. And Olivia, looking on, began to comprehending, was stung with a sense of defeat and impotent passion. And Caroline Morrison, comprehending too, lifted such an appealing glance to John Garth's face as more than repaid him for his share in the affair. Then the fire had gone out of her eyes, and left a shadow as of tears, and the scorn of her mouth settled to sweetness and womanly dignity. And she said mouth seemed to say, "I have found a gentleman."

It was not an agreeable going home for Olivia after this event. As for John Garth into the street she tried a cool ignoring of the whole, with her simplest manner, and talking sweetly of an indifferent topic. But John Garth had shame, hated any covering of the truth, and broke down her defences with a sharpness that startled her. But John was sorry for her, wanted so to let her love her—not angelic—but truly noble and generous.

Which side of your inheritance helped you tonight, Olivia? Was it the Ruthermayne noblesse that enabled you to fling a stone at Miss Morrison?"

Olivia was sotenally scared at his savage tone, but she braved him with a sneer which maddened John Garth to blows.

"I was a blow fit for a base hand, not for yours, Olivia; and it has left a worse stain than Erasmus Ruthermayne's murder."

"How absurdly angry you are, John; you don't understand the matter at all. I did a perfectly right thing to-night. Miss Morrison and myself are in two entirely different circles. I was brought into contact with her here in a business connection; in this we were obliged to have a good deal to do with each other, and I knew that unless I took leave of her at the end in a simple business way, that I might be misunderstood and annoyed in future by being claimed as an acquaintance—such people are very apt to do so."

"Such people! Want do you mean, Olivia? Do you mean that you have proved Miss Morrison to be coarse and vulgar, and an unfit associate by that proof for any lady? No," not waiting for her to answer, but going on vehemently, "you have found her refined and delicate, and wellbred. Don't talk to me of sets and circles, Olivia; it is the most besotted, shallow rich under the sun, for that does it signify but that you are under the tyrannous rule of a certain number of persons, who your friendship can dare not move. What a narrow and cowardly condition, to say the least! Olivia, there are no limits or laws to good society, but those of true breeding and refinement; if we hate the one, or outrage the other, we lose our claim."

Olivia here flamed into scarlet beneath the emphasis of his tone. She did not speak, and he went on:

"There is one whose genius you admire much, and whose character is worthy of such a genius you would scarcely question, who has said: 'Fine society is not exclusive, does not avoid, but all that does not belong to it drops away from it like water from a smooth statue.'"

There was a long pause following this, which neither broke. For Olivia, she had nothing to answer, and for John Garth, his wrath was spent, and only the sense of disappointment and humiliation left. What had he left but to let go and passed down the street, looking into his melancholy face, she knew what she had lost.

CHAPTER III.

TIZZIE was a crowd of gay company at the Cape. Olivia Ruthermayne and her "set" pronounced it a "mixed company," and held themselves aloof as was their custom. Erasmus Ruthermayne, the brother, an idle, dissolute young fellow, who might have been a useful, brilliant man, if he had had any energy, voted the Ruthermayne "set" stupid and a bore.

"I know an artist and his sister here who is worth the whole of it," he declared once to me to Olivia, heating his hand upon the soft arm, in irregular time to the band in the hall. "His name is Ravenswood, and his sister made a form a brewhouse or something, and lets his boy follow his bent—he's just back from Italy—a trump of a fellow—and I'm going to paint; wish I could wish I knew how to do anything," and the hand kept on beating the d mask in that irregular movement. Olivia was in common industry to Clarence Ruthermayne's state in the evening. It was such a usual thing, that Olivia had forgotten to remark it. It was perhaps unconscious of it now He went on:

"The sister's a trump, too. There she goes, Livy—look at her in her purple dress and white flowers. Splendid girl!"

John Garth, who was one of the group here, met Olivia's eyes, and they both colored.

"It's curious," he thought, "how things keep coming up. Life is just like a play." He thought this over, and then he thought it over again.

Olivia, sitting there, saw John Garth go something down the room, and stop to talk with Caroline Morrison. She had not been speaking between them since that night last winter, but she knew that his acquaintance had not stopped at that night.

"John knows her, hey?" broke out Clarence, as he observed John's movement. "Hang it, I'd a mind myself."

He did not finish his sentence, but pulled his moustache, and looked sullenly out of hagard at the two. Olivia was not in the best humor.

"You'd a great mind to go and speak to her. Why don't you go now?" she said scornfully.

He laughed a grating laugh.

"I'm not in the best trim now, Livy. It is only the Ruthermayne set who appreciate me in the evening."

Olivia woke up to the truth, at the sneer.

"You speak as if I understood, Clarence," she exclaimed, angrily. He laughed again, then got up and went out, with a heavy lounging step. Olivia watched him presently, talking to Caroline Morrison, shuddered, as he noted him.

"But for that vice he might be a man, for he has great qualities," he said to his companion.

"What kind of vice?" the latter inquired.

John shuddered again, but he did not answer her.

What led him? It was part of his inheritance —part of the Ruthermayne blood, of which Olivia was so proud. John Garth could not help thinking of it as he looked at that Clarence Ruthermayne caught the Morrisons with evident pleasure; but it was always of mornings, when his head was clear, his hand steady and his eye true. On one of these mornings he said to John as they sat smoking

"How could you ever imagine me a reformed man?"

It was a strange question, and before John could answer it, he went on:

"I've a mind to try, John; with the infernal habit that I have. It would be hard work—I know something about it—but at this moment Caroline Morrison in her pure white morning-robe passed them; he lifted his hat to her, and finished his sentence—"I might be worth while."

In an instant, Garth knew what was in his mind, and had stopped him to the idea of reform. He repeated it with new impetus. Certainly he sat that moment now, clear-brained and powerful, a worthy man to help love him, for he was genial, generous, and full of talent, and handsome as a god, but for the haggard eyes, the weary mouth—it may fatal signs. And Caroline Morrison? would she believe in the power she might have? He shuddered as he thought, partly from fear for her, partly from another fear, which struck him with a new strange dread. But the end came sooner than he imagined. He was sitting in the same place the next morning, smoking, and wondering where Clarence was, who usually joined him there at that hour, when he saw him coming up the path to the house. He went in without a glance to the right or the left, but with his head bent despondently, and his hands thrust into his pockets. Garth knew at once what had happened to him. He had been rejected.

"Poor fellow," he murmured, with real sympathy for the wrecked life and hope; but relief and thanksgiving was dominant.

Two great fears were saved. Caroline Morrison was saved from a wrecked future—for he would not behind there. The permanent reform was for a man like Clarence Ruthermayne. And for his own part—let us see. It was later in the day that he sat outside a low window, talking with Harry Morrison and his sister, Caroline; Caroline was more silent than usual, and Garth noticed a look of pain upon her face.

Harry was in the midst of a picture description, intent and ardent, when a heavy slouching step came behind them. They all looked up unanimously; Garth felt before he looked, that it was Clarence Ruthermayne. He reeled towards them, his expression half vacant, half reckless.

"Talking about pictures, hey, Harry? What yer been painting? Why don't yer paint yer sister?"

He leaned unsteadily against the rail of the balcony, and hesitating a moment, went on.

"Say, why don't you paint yer sister? Paint her for me, will you? I'll give yer an order; you'll not say "no" to that Miss Morrison, will yer?"

There was a hurling of meaning in his words which was terrible to hear in this state.

Miss Morrison rose, scared and pained by the scene, and moved towards the window, when he reached forward and grasped her arm. Her brother and John Garth sprang to their feet, but Clarence by his own act had stepped heavily backward, and fallen, face upwards on the sward.

There he lay, young and full of life, and beauty, and gifts behind them. A few hours ago in the full heap. And at the moment a voice from within the hand, humming gaily a gay tune; Caroline Morrison started.

"His sister I oh she must not see him!" and in, the low window-sill, she ran to stay Olivia's approach, with some remembrance, no thought but of tenderness and pity.

"Miss Ruthermayne, there has been an accident, and you get me your help directly?"

This was the first suggestion—anything for a moment's delay, until the green sward should be free from its present burden.

Olivia stared in surprise for an instant at being thus addressed. She was turning to obey, however, when the voice of John Garth arrested her.

"What is it—who is it?" and she retraced her steps.

Caroline Morrison put up her hands to bar her progress.

"Do not go out there, do not, I beg of you, Miss Ruthermayne."

"Why should I not go where my cousin is?" cried Olivia haughtily, and pushing past her, she saw swiftly and with what her cousin's voice. "What is it, what is the matter, John?"

A glance at John's face and at the face they bore left no room for doubt on the ground of her sorrow.

"Go away, Olivia," said John, honestly, "this is no place for you," and then the meandering voice from her brother's breathed lips broke forth again.

"Yes, go way, Livie; what yer here for?" and the poor fellow raised his head that still bled freshly, as they carried him to his room. For John Garth, though filled with shame and disgust, through it all there was pity, pure sweet compassion—what other scene, no feature of which he had lost, where Caroline Morrison ran out to save from bitter humiliation the brother who had not hesitated to cast insult and humiliation upon her. Upon whose sheath now should he engraved Voltaire slight? "Noblesse oblige!" Yes, they clung in its deepest, truest sense, if not Caroline Morrison?

You may be sure he thought of this, when he asked her a few hours later to be his wife—that he approached her reverently, with no rule of his own state for her, from hope or fear, and that truly he felt himself honored by her "yes."

Olivia, disappointed and humiliated, could not help her any more at the tidings, and John Garth may be pardoned for his final retort.

On one side I come of the Ruthermayne blood, Olivia, and I may have proved myself true it once, but I think I may blush for it in this generation," and he cast a significant glance from her to the door of the house as he walked into the room with unsteady step.

"What's that, John, about the Ruthermayne blood?" said Harry, "I know I have gone to change the current. It's time, it's time."

Then rising up with a glean of his real manhood, he held out his hand.

"John, you're worthy of her, I never was, never should have been. She's nobler than any Ruthermayne of the present day, and I wish you joy, God bless you both," and there were tears in the haggard eyes.

John Garth came on, shivered and turned pale, and perhaps for the first time she may have felt the real meaning of Noblesse oblige.

The authorities of the London Zoological Gardens have just added to its collection a curious porpoise. It was captured by some fishermen at Seal, and brought to Brighton by railway under the care of Yarrell, the society's keeper. When received at the Gardens it was found to be very much bruised on the face and eyes, and of fret refused to feed. He has, however, recovered his spirits, and now takes his meals regularly. They consist of live eels, which he catches for himself in the pleasing object which had unconsciously imported their progress, spread herself all over it, and so completely covered it that the horse became aware of its once manageable, and carried them to their journey's end without further incident.

THE HEROES OF FORT FISHER.

BY LIEUT. R. V. KING, U. S. A.

Unfurl the Old Flag, let it wave in the breeze,
O'er the walls of old Fisher, shot-torn and grim,
Where Terry and Porter won the victor's bright wreath
Of laurels, whose brightness no time can e'er dim.

God bless the brave tarsdemon and seamen who fought
Hand-in-hand through those hours of peril and strife,
Kind heaven repay with welcome those who bought
The victory for Freedom with blood and with life.

Their graves will grow green amidst the songs of the deep,
And the low waves that ripple its billowy tide,
But cherished for ever by the millions that weep
Are the deeds of the heroes who struggled and died.

When Columbia shall ope her bright pages of fame,
And give to the nations her record of Right,
Undimm'd in the glory that will crown every name
Of the army and navy who braved the dread fight.

Then welcome with honor the legions that strove
In the smoke of the battle, for Country and God,
And shield my one offering of friendship and love,
With tears for the brave ones who sleep 'neath the sod.

When the angels of Victory and Peace hover o'er us,
And the thunders of war are hushed into rest,
To the victors of Fisher we'll chaunt the glad chorus,
And give praises to Him who hath Liberty blest

CHAPTER XIV.—VERY PRIVATE THEATRICALS.

THE river was gray and dim in the twilight by this time, for the first half of October was gone, and the dark shadows gathered early on Mr. Hillary's lawn. Francis Tredethyn found the gardens deserted when he left the terrace, and walked slowly towards the house, where lights were gleaming in innumerable windows. The young man had only ridden down to Twickenham that morning, and had no special engagement to dine at the Cedars.

"I'll go round to the stables at once," he thought, "and can call in Kedgrave's street to-morrow, and tell Mr. Hillary that I think of going abroad. Why should I see her again? The sight of her will only make me Foolish, and keep me base in spite of myself."

The lady thus vaguely alluded to was not Miss Desmond; but when Francis Tredethyn entered Mr. Hillary's house by the first open window that he found on the upper terrace, he found himself in a little chilly room affected by the ladies of the household, and he came suddenly upon a female figure sitting alone in the dark.

Somebody whose guilty past shot through him as he recognised that stately figure, even in the shadowy obscurity of the unlighted room. In the next moment there was a rustling of silk, and Miss Desmond had risen and was facing him in the twilight.

"Yes, it is Mr. Tredethyn," she said presently. "What have you been doing with yourself all this afternoon? There has been a grand discussion about some private theatricals, concerning which Maude Hillary is absolutely bewitched, and we want you to act."

"I think you've got plenty of fellows who'll act better than I can, Miss Desmond, though I did try my hand at the business once in Van Diemen's Land, and to be glad to make myself useful in any way that would please Miss Hillary, if it was to dress myself as a footman and carry a tea-tray or a cruet-stand on to the table. I think I am leaving England before the theatricals come off; in point of fact, I think I shall be leaving England directly."

"Leaving England!"

The captain and those two words could scarcely have been more tragical than it was; and yet for once in a way Miss Desmond was not acting. All in a moment she saw the fair fabric which she had schemed to build for herself crumbling into ruin and chaos.

"Leaving England!" she repeated—"you think of leaving England, Mr. Tredethyn?"

She put her hands to her forehead with a little tragic gesture, and Francis Tredethyn saw that she had entered the house by any other door or window than that which he had chosen.

Julia's dismay was entirely real; for this disappointment was very bitter to this young lady, who had built up a fair future for herself on the friendship of Francis Tredethyn's wealthy, old, grim walls of Castle Desmond, the silver waters of the Shannon, the green hillsides and lonely valleys, made themselves into a picture that shut out the dusky room, and then melted into gray blankness. She had meant to do such great things with Francis Tredethyn's thirty thousand a year!

The young man stood looking at her in so much embarrassment as if he had been guilty of some wilful deception. He was a little of a coxcomb, that it was very difficult for him to imagine that his sudden departure could give pain to the brilliant Julia. He was so entirely simple and trustworthy himself, that no suspicion of Miss Desmond's mercenary views had any place in his mind.

There was a very brief pause, and then Julia recovered, in low, half-broken accents:

"You are really going away? But why?"

"Oh, Miss Desmond, scarcely like to tell you why; and yet it is not altogether on that account," answered Francis, vaguely. "There are other reasons. I cannot in my rights please amongst such people as I meet here. They look, understand, follow, and idleness doesn't suit me. I want to be of some use in the world. Why, I felt myself a better man one day yonder, without money in my pocket, than I am to-day, in spite of Oliver Tredethyn's money. So I mean to buy a commission and go out to India, where there's some fighting to be done."

"You are not telling me the truth, Mr. Tredethyn. Why do you run away from your own country when from the Cedars, as if the house were infected."

"My dear Miss Desmond, I—you have been so kind to me—you have left me to feel so much at home here, where, but for you, I must have felt myself so miserably out of place."

"Why should you be out of place amongst these people?" cried Julia, drawing up her head with a proud gesture, "unless," she murmured, in a hardly audible tone—"unless because these people are so much beneath you."

Miss Desmond had entirely recovered herself by this time. All at once, during the short time at the table, playing her cards with infinite tact and patience, all at once she found herself losing the game, and saw that there was but one hope could help her. But Julia was equal to the situation. The 3d of December had come upon her very suddenly, but she did not despair of triumphing by a coup d'état.

Tell me the truth, Mr. Tredethyn," she said, looking full in his face with her dark eyes, and teeth gleaming in the twilight, "why are you going to leave this house? Why do you talk of hurrying away from England?"

"Because—because—I have done you a wrong in absorbing so much of your society, Miss Desmond, and the people here have begun to use your name with mine. I cannot bear that you, who are so superior to me, should be humiliated by such an association, especially when there is no foundation for their talk," Francis Tredethyn added, in considerable embarrassment.

"Oh, I understand it all," answered Julia, with an unutterable bitterness in her tone; "you have been warned against me, Mr. Tredethyn. I am only a fortune-hunter, and I have begun my spreading my toils about your innocent footsteps, and it is only by flight that you can save yourself. Do you?" she added, in a lower voice, finding it necessary to express a keener anguish than another woman's wildest sob, "I know how these people talk?"

Miss Desmond, on my honor—"

"Mr. Tredethyn, on my honor, I know the world better than you do. If you had been exposed more to any other woman in this house, to any daughter of that mercantile aristocracy in which Mr. Hillary ranks supreme, you would have received a colder greeted your car. But what am I—the daughter of the Desmonds of Desmond—among these people? Why do you fear me, Francis? Are you not companion? I am poor, and I endure poverty in its most cruel bitterness—for I am poor amongst the valley of those who are rich—and I have fortune? who dares trust in my friendship? I am a well-bred pauper, a fortune-hunter, an adventuress, a creature to be shunned and feared by those who would be avoided. Oh, Francis Tredethyn, friend Julia, with a sudden sliver of agony, which would have pierced her deeply, had "I know so well what has been said to you. Go—go at once. You are wise to accept the warning conveyed in those pretty compliments. Go—there is a gulf between you and me, for you are rich and I am poor. Beware of me even when I seem most sincere. Remember that I am a pauper and the descendant of paupers—paupers who shed their blood and squandered their fortunes in a cause that was doomed. For the love of honor and loyalty, two words that would seem the emptiest sounds to merchants and tradesmen, Mr. Tredethyn, have pity upon me, and go."

And then Miss Desmond broke down in a piece of bravura—a burst of hysterical sobbing, and stretching out her hand towards the back of a prie-Dieu chair standing near, tottered as if she would have fallen. But Francis, with a cry of pity, caught the hand could reach the prie-Dieu Francis Tredethyn's strong arm was round her.

"Miss Desmond!" he cried, "Julia! Why do you talk like this? Do you think that my base thought about your career entered my brain? You—you—Julia! Are you—did you—can you—in my innocent thoughts by such a name as that?"

"No, I answered Julia, with a face as pale as noble: and yet you must have been infinitely cruel others. Way should you think better of me than others think? Why should not you, too, despise me?"

Her voice was broken by sobs, and she was still supported by Mr. Tredethyn's arm. He felt that she was trembling violently. He could just distinguish her handsome profile in the dusk, and the large dark eyes looking up at him.

"Despise you, Julia! you who are so superior to me! Do you forget what I am? Have I not been a grade rcteen—footman—menial? And you talk of poverty as if that were so deep a suffering, while I am so rich and care so little for my money. Share it with me, Julia. I'm only a poor waif and stray as it is; but with such a woman as you for my wife I might be of some good in the world. Heaven knows you are welcome to my fortune, Miss Desmond. If you wore a man and my comrade I would say—Share it with me as my brother and my friend. But you are a woman, and I can only say, 'Be my wife.'"

Julia withdrew herself from the supporting arm.

"Ah, Mr. Tredethyn," she said, in an icy kind of voice, "this is the bitterest insult of all. The Desmonds do not marry for money: they only marry where they are beloved, and can love again."

"How can I expect that you can love me?" asked Francis. "Do you think I can forget that I am an ignorant hoor, suddenly thrown amongst people full of knowledge of life, whose very thoughts are strange to me?"

"And you would marry a woman without so much as asking her if she loves you?"

"I would ask for her friendship and her fidelity. I shouldn't care to exact an uneven bargain, Miss Desmond, but I would try to make you happier than myself," the young man answered, rather coldly; but at the sound of a stifled sob from Julia he paused, and his voice softened. A thousand generous impulses were stirred in him by the aspect of her distress. He was nothing more than a child in the hands of this designing Irishwoman.

"Dear Miss Desmond," he cried, "I seem destined to offend and grieve you. If you will abas my fortune, if you will accept my best friendship and fidelity, my whole life shall prove to you how much I admire and respect you. If you reject my offer, I am ruined."

But Julia did not allow him to finish the sentence, which she fancy would be expressive of a complete repudiation of her claims.

"Oh, Francis," she exclaimed, "you offer me your fortune!" There was something sublime in her contempt—something of that last stand which "You ask me to accept your friendship, when I have been weak and mad enough to love you." Again she paused, and her deep, she was Maudie's Dorval, all melting tenderness and womanly pathos. She covered her face with her hands, and shook with sobs, and fell between a sob and a shudder, rushed suddenly from the room, and hurried along the dusky staircase and passages to her own apartment.

The candles were lighted on the dressing-table, but there was no intrusive handmaiden to annoy Miss Desmond by her watchful glances, her mute interrogations. Julia looked at her reflection in the glass, and saw herself flushed and triumphant, with traces of tears upon her cheeks.

"And my eyes really red," she thought; "but then the chance was such a good one, and so nearly lost. What a good, simple-hearted fellow he is! and how very reasonable his offer might be with him—and thirty thousand a year! Ah, Maude Hillary! it was very pretty, and childish, and full of romance of you to make out of my sleep on your last birthday, to show me the set of diamonds and opals papa had bribed you maid to purloin for you; but I have you which I will show you diamonds before long that shall make you ashamed of that birthday trumpery."

Miss Desmond rose from her chair, and crept smooth knot at the back of her head, and she put on a dress of that fugitive golden yellow, in which the painters delight to clothe the angels of heaven, and which milliners call maize, a bewilderingly beautiful color when seen in conjunction with a pendent emerald ear-drops and bracelets which the Cedars that evening declared that Julia Desmond had never looked so splendid. Francis Tredethyn was the only person who was near her all the evening; and at night, when he found himself alone in the pretty chintz-curtained chamber that he had so often occupied of late, the young man seated himself by one of the windows, and pushing open the sash, looked out at the quiet river rippling in the moonlight.

"And she is to be my wife," he thought; "she is very handsome, and I ought to be proud to think that she cares for me—that she has had a hard yet——" His head sank forward on his folded arms and the image of a beautiful creature smiled upon him in the dreamy brightness of sleep—a opium-eater's dream, Francis Tredethyn gave one long regretful sigh as he raised his head, and looked out dreamily at the distant woodland on the other side of the river.

"What can it matter whom I marry?" he asked himself presently, with a sudden start of pain. "If I were to come to this house every day for ten years at a stretch? Why, her dogs are more to me than she is. Her horses are more than I am. And Julia Desmond loves me, and thinks me better than those fellows with the yellow whiskers, who are always talking of new books and new music. They please her; but Julia despises them, Am I such a wretch that I cannot be grateful for the devotion of a beautiful creature? I am grateful for her. I am proud to think that she will be my wife. But I wish I was back in Van Diemen's Land, with the sea sparkling outside, and smoking shag tobacco with Surly Bill the burglar."

After that dramatic little scene in the twilight Julia Desmond was herself again—or, rather, Julia was triumphant; Maude was delighted and sympathetic. What could be more charming or more romantic than the way in which Julia had met with thirty thousand a year for his fortune? The only hindrance to universal happiness in a very delightful set was the fact that Julia, who might have had to do without thirty thousand a year, Miss Hillary thought, whenever she gave her mind to the subject, was in love with Lovegrove.

"And you will be so rich, dear Julia," Maude said, as she kissed her friend; "and if Harcourt Dorval will only be reasonable, he cannot help but gives his consent by-and-bye—you'll take us for a drive in the Park sometimes, won't you? And if you are very, very good indeed, I shall perhaps be able to come to them, for you wouldn't like to see me always in the same dress, like those poor people at the union, and I shall be obliged to get a set of black lace flounces like Jeder—you never saw Jeder, my last Governess governess but once—and put them on pink silk one day, and lime the next, and so on; it's very troublesome, and the flounce don't generally come straight, but then it looks as if one had so many dresses. Of course you'll have horses at both houses, Julia, and on the grand tier? and you'll buy a place in the country—and oh, where do you mean to live in town?"

Miss Desmond answered all these eager queries very demurely. Francis would make all arrangements for their future life, she said: he had certainly promised her the two opera boxes, and he had made inquiries about the one house that was to be let in Park Lane, and he was anxious to discover her favorite county before taking any steps towards the purchase of an estate.

"But you know he is such a dear good fellow, and has such a knack of guessing all my fancies that I never like to suggest anything," Miss Desmond concluded modestly; but somehow or other, without making any direct suggestions, she had so contrived matters, that in a few weeks her affianced husband had gratified many of the desires that had been smouldering in her breast ever since the earliest dawn of girlhood.

Already the "family jools" of the Desmonds had been consigned to the oblivion of one of Julia's shabbiest trunks, and diamonds now twinkled on Miss Desmond's neck and arms, and gleamed here and there in her black hair when she came down to dinner in her maize silk dress. Her toilette-table was all of a glitter with the rings she drew off her slim fingers when she disrobed at night, before the looking-glass in which had so often reflected a gloomy, discontented face, but which now only gave back triumphant smiles.

She was an adventuress, perhaps, and her triumph was an ignoble one; but she was not altogether base. She was grateful to the good wife to the man whom she had brought to her feet by force of feminine strategy. She did not regard Francis Tredethyn, as indeed, she seemed to be made of a sterner stuff than that of which the women who gain love are fashioned. She did not love her affianced husband, but she meant to be as faithful and devoted as the most loving wife in Christendom. If she intended to raise herself from the bondage of her husband's wealth, she meant that he should mount with her. Already she had fitted him several stages on the social ladder, and before the very first month's rent had saved him from a hundred small solecisms, and in the more intimate relationship of the last few days had been training information had been almost magical in its effects. The good old blood of the Tredethyns asserted itself, and Julia found her pupil an easy one.

"I don't want you to be like those Government clerks, and magazine writers, and embryo M.P.'s that I used to train at home," I like you to be big, deep-voiced, and—just a little clumsy. The Knights-Templars, and Crusaders, and that sort of people used to be chosen young on account of their armor. I always fancy I hear the clank of spurs when you come into a room; and you look as if in Parliament time you'd be soldier's friend, you know, and make great speeches about raisons and court-martial verdicts, and that sort of thing. I'll see about taking; and I shall come into the ladies' gallery, and strain my eyes by peeping at you through the interstices of the fan. I'll get you a helmet, some, with your head thrown a little back, and your hand in your waistcoat."

Now this kind of talk from a handsome woman, whose big brown eyes were infinitely her intellectual superior, can scarcely be displeasing to the most strong-minded of men; and, unlikely, Francis Tredethyn was the strong-minded person. He locked down at his Julia with a sheepish smile, and acknowledged in her pretty flatteries in the most humble manner that was what he meant to the Cedars next morning, he brought with him the biggest emerald-headed serpent that he had been able to find among the jewellers in the West End, and coiled it about his Julia's wrist. He was grateful to her for all her tender smiles and caressing speeches—all the more grateful, perhaps, because of that uncomfortable knowledge that the cold fit of his heart, which love for his promised wife should have been, to be brought her all manner of costly tribute in the shape of bracelets and bracelets, necklaces and headgear; and bought her a three hundred guinea hunter at Tattersalls, so that she should not be outdone by Maddie Hillary's horses in the Twickenham lanes. Sometimes, in spite of himself, even when Julia was most agreeable, the young man found himself wishing that he could too gladly have given her the whole of his fortune if by such a gift he might have freed himself from the chain that bound him to her.

"But if I were free to-morrow, she would not care for me, he thought; 'and what would be the use of my liberty?'"

On the 21st ult. the library of the Cathedral Church of Strongnaes, Sweden, was destroyed by fire. It contained a great number of valuable manuscripts, and among them the celebrated Codex Argenteus, said to be written in letters of silver. The building was founded in the thirteenth century, and sciences and arts have suffered an irreparable loss.

It is worthy of note that the Fêtes of Europe which boast of having been ruled by greatest number of queens are Belgium, and a country also surrounded by the most gorgeous royal pageants, are the two countries which are the least given to boasting. In proof of this may be adduced Spain, Austria, Portugal, and Italy, the most distant of the European sovereignties, the court of Rome.

European papers state that the peninsula of Caucasus holds certain inexhaustible springs of petroleum. No fewer than 100 are now worked, and the supply equals a daily tun of petroleum, which is then brought from America. There are also many springs of the kind in the Isle of Taman.

"I HAVE always been astonished," said Miss Smith, "at the anxiety of young ladies for beaux, but I never pitied a female more than when Miss Montalbert left my school. Seeing her going towards the sky, I asked her what she was looking for.

"That beau," said she, 'which is told of as being seen in the clouds—I wish he'd come down.'"

SECOND INAUGURATION OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN AS PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, IN FRONT OF THE CAPITOL, WASHINGTON, MARCH 4, 1865.

ON PICKET BEFORE PETERSBURG,

Sept., 1864.

BY HAROLD PERCY.

I AM here alone. Alone in the dark;
With no companions but the twinkling stars,
And those dull watchfires yonder which do mark
The steady line that firmly, strongly bars
Our further progress. 'Tis a solemn place,
To sit without a sight of human face
All these long hours; knowing that every one
May be the time you host has fixed upon
To swoop down on our vitals. I am not
A coward in the field. The yell of shot
And crash of cannon strikes no fear to me.
But in the night, out of the wild melée,
My blood will sometimes curdle to my heart,
When I recall wherein I have borne part
Throughout the bloody day. I think I see
The face of that young Southron, whom I slew,
A hundred times each night, appearing through
The chilly gloom; and of the picture bright
Of that young spirit he wore in his breast,
Which fell to me when in the hush of night
We laid him kindly as we could to rest.

It was not murder, for my blood was hot,
Ebbing and flowing with the battle's tide,
His hand to mine, and mine to his again,
Made music such as soldiers love to hear.
And he fell dead. His long, black curling hair
All matted with the blood that issued when
My blade had fallen. When I saw the face
Of this fair picture, and most surely felt
That some young heart wept him by whom I knelt,
I almost wished my muscles had not been
So firmly knit, and I to do this sin
Had been unable. For I felt if he Had conquered, none would weep for me.
Not that it was the first my hand had slain,
Nor yet the least blood-guilty, for he came Upon me madly with his good blade wet
With better blood than mine. But even yet
I feel remorse for this sweet creature's sake,
And for the tie it was my lot to break,
Although I slew him in mine own defence.

Another hour! I fain would be at home;
Sleeping once more beneath my native sky,
With friends about my bed. Then I could die
And be most happy, but I do not like
To fall in some wild battle and be laid
A foot beneath the sod of some lone glade
Where never sound shall come from day to day,
Beyond the clashing of some fierce affray.
It may be so. God knows, not I.
I am content, and else there is not one
To weep or murmur. Is it sin to kiss
The picture of so fair a thing as this?
No, the dead Southron's love
Shall be the holiest after that above
Of all things known. And if the battle's tide
Shall, ebbing, leave me dead, upon my breast
You'll find the picture of the soldier's bride,
And know he is avenged. As for the rest,
Let Heaven decide. Ho! comrades, up!
The rebels come! Our Southern foe is here!
Call for our legions, hold fast to this spot
Till all is lost or won, or die with a cheer!

AN ENGLISHMAN'S WILD STORY.

PART I.

EDGAR ALLAN POE, in his "Philosophy of Composition," tells us that, in writing tales or novels founded on fiction, we must decide first on our peculiar situation, or dénouement, which is to form the point of the story. Write that carefully first, and then work up the other parts to fit it, keeping all subservient to that chosen end. The choice of the incident may be determined by a thousand-and-one considerations. Law reports give many startling ones, and good ones too; for not only are they real, but they are accompanied by the wholesome moral of detected crime.

But the law reports are not the only places to look for the dramas of real life. Certainly I am not the only one who noticed a year or two ago, in the first column of the Times, a lifelong drama that was simply told in three short paragraphs, thus (the names and place are altered):

BIRTHS.

On the 14th inst., at Pentypool, the wife of J. H. Hawker, Esq., of a son.

MARRIAGES.

On the 14th inst., at Pontypool, by special licence, J. H. Hawker, Esq., to Emily Ann Bridgemann.

DEATHS.

On the 14th inst., at Pentypool, Emily Ann, the wife of J. H. Hawker, Esq.

It would be difficult, I imagine, to tell such a story of shame—repentance, let us hope—and death in fewer words.

The second column of the same paper occasionally gives us curious peeps into scenes that often prove "stranger than fiction." One that appeared a long time ago, and reads as if addressed to a dead man, seems to give a glimpse at the last scene of some tragedy. Here it is:

TO THE PARTY WHO POSTS HIS LETTERS IN PRINCE'S STREET, LEICESTER SQUARE.

Your family is now in a state of excitement unbearable. Your attention is called to an advertisement in Wednesday's morning Advertiser, headed, "A body found drowned at Deptford." After your avowal to your friend as to what you might do, he has been to see the decomposed remains, accompanied by others. The features are gone; but there are marks on the arm; so that, unless they hear from you to-day, it will satisfy them that the remains are those of their misguided relative, and steps will be directly taken to place them in the family vault, as they cannot bear the idea of a pauper's funeral.

But this lifting of the curtain for a moment, though startling, shows nothing more than the glimpse we get; and the lurid light thus thrown on the scene only leaves us in deeper darkness than before. We cannot do better than follow Poe's plan, and decide first on the character of our story. Shall it be grave or gay? Grave. Soit. Incontestably, few things are of graver import than those mysterious laws that control the working of the mind, and regulate those efforts made by it, that are commonly known as "will." If, then, we can lay down some law (in our own minds) by which these efforts are governed, and narrate some story to illustrate it, we at once create interest; for curiosity, like a crossing-sweeper, will follow the unknown passer-by for a chance copper more tenaciously than those with whose economy he is acquainted.

Having decided on the general style, we have two or three minor points to settle before we commence. For instance, it at once suggests itself that the story must be told in the first person, where the incidents are so strictly personal, so intimately connected with the inner self. And we must not forget the particular principle we wish to inculcate.

In reference to the particular point on which we have decided to write, it has always struck me that the word "supernatural" has been very improperly connected with it, and indeed often applied to it. Simply because we cannot understand a thing, are we to say it is superhuman? At the end of the last century, any old lady venturing to light her pipe with a lucifer match would have run a very good chance of having her thumbs and great toes tied in a bunch, and finding herself drowning as a witch in the nearest brook. And even in part of this century it would have been dangerous for Mr. Bain to have propounded that wonderful telegraph of his by which a man in London can sign his name in St. Petersburg, or where you will, within hearing of certain Spanish ecclesiastics. No! those remarkable phenomena that are so often called supernatural, I believe to be the result of a powerful, active will, the creation of a living brain, diseased perhaps, and in a state of unnatural excitement; but half conscious, it may be, of its terrible unknown power, and reeling from the violence of its own struggles. But whether sane or insane, the workings of that mind are governed by natural laws, though as yet we do not understand them.

Overworked and yielding to the solicitations of my wife and friends, I left the practice entirely in the hands of my partner, and accepted the invitation of my kind old friend, Doctor Goodenough. The perfect rest, the lovely wild Welsh scenery, soon showed its effects, and day by day I recruited both strength and spirits; and ere long I was able to face, with a sense of exhilaration that I had long been a stranger to, the keen frosty wind that then, in the early part of January, swept down into our quiet valley from the snowy heights beyond. Goodenough's quick appreciation of character, sturdy common sense combined with great tact and quickness, fitted him peculiarly for the care of cases complicated with any mental derangement. There were several under his care. As my own health improved in tone, I began to listen with interest to the particulars of the various cases, and felt gratified that my old friend should thus seek my opinion. He showed me his notes of one case which he had—as far as human eye could see—treated with perfect success. It was peculiar; the subject in his early youth had on one occasion, and one only, shown symptoms of insanity, the seeds of which lay dormant until after life. He must have been a man of great determination, for on his recent recovery he thus described his recollection of the occasion of the fit:

"One night, after a number of weeks of fearful suffering, as I was lying in bed tossing, sleepless and despairing, a most horrible impulse seized upon me, an impulse impelling me to destroy one who, of all living beings, most deserved my love. I buried myself under the bedclothes, and struggled with the hellish impulse till the bed shook. It still gained strength. I sprang up, clung to the bedpost, and drove my teeth, in the agony of despair, into the hard wood. It was uncontrollable. I shut my eyes, bowed down my head for fear that I should see her, and rushed out of the house. Barefooted, with no covering save a nightshirt, I ran through the streets to the police office, and implored them to lock me up. Fortunately the officer on duty was a humane and sensible man. He gave me a watchcoat to wrap round me, kept me under his eye, and I suppose, sent to my friends, for my wife and sister came with clothing. The paroxysm had passed, and gasping, panting for death in any form, I accompanied them home, steeped to the lips in despair."

This case, which was one of well-marked latent insanity (latent for nearly twenty years), interested us much, and sincerely we trusted that it might not prove intermittent, of which latter type a very curious and well-marked case was under my friend's care.

"I know nothing of the history of the man," said Goodenough, "except that he came here many years ago, and voluntarily placed himself under the care of my predecessor. He occupies a small suite of rooms, makes few acquaintances, and quite seems to shun the quiet public sitting-room and billiard-room, where there are generally two or three convalescents to be found. Botany, on which subject he has written much and well, is his principal pursuit. But the most remarkable point is the persistency and regularity of his mental attacks. In the early part of each year (and you will have the opportunity, I imagine, of seeing this for yourself) he becomes careless of his person and his dress, moody and irritable—savagely passionate and violent—so much so, that towards the end of the month it has always been necessary to place him under restraint. Another curious phase in the case is, that as the cerebral excitement increases, his English is replaced by another language, that neither I nor any one here can understand. I judge from this that he is not an Englishman; that his brain, losing the grasp over the acquired tongue, lapses to its native one. As he grows older the gradual recovery from each access of delirium takes longer and longer. In his lucid intervals, growing shorter every year, he has occasionally, at my earnest request, written what he can recollect of his state of mind during the accession of the attacks. This passage, with which he commences one of these papers, is remarkable, and shows in what way he expects death to supervene:

"'It is a fearful thing for a man to be mad, and to be conscious that he is so. I am convinced that a thought of an intensely exciting nature passing through a brain in this state, or through one very easily excited naturally, can kill as quickly as a shock of electricity from a thundercloud, and that the death-bearing messengers in both cases are nearly allied.

"'I have, while recovering from an attack of mania, not once, but several times, been struck down as utterly senseless by a thought as I could have been by a blow.'

"I have no doubt but some of those sudden deaths, for which no cause can be assigned or seen, are the results of this silent thunder, which bursts from the imagination when in a state of excitement or disease."

I took an early opportunity of calling upon this gentleman, in company with Doctor Goodenough. It was in the middle of January, and the usual premonitory symptoms had begun to show themselves. His appearance was striking; but the attention was riveted on his eye, so cold, so clear and pitiless, flickering now and again with a febrile brightness. Our visit was a very short one; but it was not until away from his presence that I could recall his massive chin, his firm thin lips hardly according with his rather narrow forehead and strangely projecting eyebrows. I learnt, with no feeling of pleasure, the next day, that he was anxious to see me. I accompanied Goodenough in his usual visit.

"Doctor," said he, "we can hear enough of our future state; we know, perhaps, too much of our present; but where can we learn our past? Look you! the soul never dies; neither is it born, at least not as our philosophy would teach us. Have I only existed some forty or fifty years? I tell you cycles have passed since my thinking powers first came into play. You too—you have recognised people, ay, and places too, that you never before saw in this life. And you, sir," turning to me and raising his voice almost fiercely, "in what wild planet or outer world have we met, and then, too, in no friendly mood?"

And truly there flashed back on my memory that night in the wild forest, when with my spirits nigh overcome in the struggle with unknown horror, staggering into the clear moonlight my knees trembling under me, dismayed but unsubdued, I was but able to cry, "I am not overcome; my spirit is not afraid," without which self-assertion my inner self felt it must have yielded to this unknown, unseen power. I know not what answer I returned to the wild adjuration of the madman.

After a moment's pause he said, quietly:

"Do you know, doctor, I believe it quite possible for a man to be in two places at once. Now, for instance, in my own occasional illnesses, I, as regards my body, remain here (though I should be sorry to vouch for that myself), while I, as regards my thinking and intellectual powers, have most certainly been elsewhere. For as I slowly recover with the coming springtime, creeping with the flowers into a fuller life, I am imbued with the idea of long, cold, weary watching, of some horrid hate-inspiring thing; and as Dante makes those spirits, who on earth have loved both wildly and unwell, be driven together round and round the limbo they are in, by a fierce cold whirlwind—now torn away from, now driven back to, their unseen, never-shifting starting-point—so I sometimes think I have been surging round and round, with a purposeless hate, some still more hateful spot."

Towards the end of the month, the 26th (how suddenly I recalled the date), Goodenough and I were quietly talking after dinner, when an assistant called him out of the room. A few minutes after, the same man returned; "The doctor's compliments, sir, and would you step up to Mr. Engstrong's room?"

I entered his room quietly. Three men, assisted by the doctor, were holding down the unhappy man on the bed; and though they did not understand his wild imprecations, in a harsh, uncouth tongue, it was evident to any, from his savage gestures and hoarse, deep voice, that he was in fierce altercation with some imagined foe. I caught a word in Swedish, and soon followed the sense of all he said. Who was "Hilda?"—she who seemed fastened to his heartstrings by ties of wildest love and fiercest hate. What were the unheard questions that called forth such awful answers? On whose head were these fearful imprecations called down? Verily a full tide of sombre recollections flowed over my memory; and, urged by what instinct I knew not, I hurried, as in a dream, to the billiard-room, and, snatching an ornamented cue from the rack, I returned. I placed myself at the foot of the man's bed. "Loose him and let him go," I am told I said; and in sheer astonishment the men relaxed their hold to look at me. He sprang up to a sitting position, his wild eyes fixed on mine, and a deep, long-drawn stertorous breathing gave as it were a voice to his fierce glare.

"Devil! would you again torment me before my time? but I have you now."

And with a frantic shout he sprang towards me. I shrank back, and, still keeping a firm eye fixed on his, held up as in an attitude of defence the butt of the cue. He staggered as does a man who receives a mortal blow. "Let be," I said to the men, who would again have seized him: and he, cowering back, shrinking from me, fell prone and gasping on the bed. Then feebly rolling himself in the clothes, amid faint cries for pity and deep-drawn sobs, half choked by the dread death-rattle in his throat, this wicked, wilful soul fled into the presence of his Maker.

Silently we left the room, I leaning on Goodenough's arm. He poured me out a glass of wine, that I gladly swallowed.

"Now tell me," said he, "who is this man, and how did you learn his history? How did you acquire such a strange power over him, the too sudden use of which I cannot but regret? And lastly, what induced you to come into the room in the strange way you did?" (for he had not seen me when I first entered).

"As to his history I know nothing; but I am certain of it all. I feel I am not mistaken; and when I have told it to you, you will understand the rest."

"Good," said he, and left me. And for a long, long time I sat there dreaming of the past, as in a trance, with my eyes open.

And this, as follows, is what I told him the next day.

PART II.

As a young man, I was extremely fond of travelling; indeed I am so now, finding that my moral as well as physical health improve by it; the bold wild scenery I always frequent induces a healthier and more manly tone of thought. I can then take a more general view of things, and less dimmed by the obtrusion of self. On one occasion I had even obtained my congé, though as yet undecided where to go—with what new scenery I should brush off the cobwebs of dull routine. It was Saturday, and the Illustrated was put into my hands. In it was an account and some sketches of the opening of a railway from Gottenburg to Stockholm. This decided me, and I sailed by the next boat for Gottenburg. Of the kindness and hospitality of every one I became acquainted with in Sweden you have already heard me speak, and no doubt you remember my mentioning an English family; but I never told you how indelibly they were impressed on my memory by after events. Our meeting, too, was strange. One night, going late to the opera—in truth it was not much, and I went only to see the ballet, in which two English figurantes appeared—I was thrust into a box in which I found an elderly gentleman nodding in one corner, and two pretty fresh-looking girls occupying the front. I seated myself in the unoccupied corner, and followed as I was able the play. I don't remember much of it; but I soon found the place unbearably hot; and seeing the ladies vigorously fanning themselves, I ventured to ask, in my best French (for I was afraid to attempt Swedish), if they would like the door opened.

"You answer him, Lucy," said one; "you speak Swedish better than I can."

That was quite sufficient introduction for me then; and when the curtain fell we were acquaintances of long standing; and the father being awake, I was introduced to him. I assisted at the cloaking, &c., preparatory to getting into the sleigh, and learnt that they lived within a few miles of Stockholm, where they had been staying for a few days; and I accepted an invitation to spend a couple of days, soon, at their house. They started, and I walked off to my hotel. In the supper-room I again met the father, and found he was staying in the same house with me. We supped together, and the day for my visit was fixed.

I drove out. If you have ever driven in a sleigh you can understand how exhilarating was the clear bright air and the tinkling sleigh-bells, as we trotted along over the crisp snow, by the soft white lakes and downy fir-trees, with their ostrich plumes stretching out over you. If you have not seen the like, I cannot attempt to describe it. I had a hearty welcome; the veriest misanthrope would have warmed to it. It was late when I arrived, and we soon sat down to dinner. I found the ladies had never learned to skate, but were burning to emulate their Swedish sisters. The next morning was devoted to skating lessons, for I had been in Canada, and had of course learnt there.

In the evening we sat round the wood fire, and mama told a ghost story and I told some more, until at last it required more courage than the young ladies could muster to go into the dark landing and light the bedroom candles, as they were accustomed to do, after saying good-night.

The next day was windy, and we spent the morning in the old billiard-room, a low, queer-shaped, oddly-lighted room. We walked out after lunch, and on returning I noticed a date cut on the stone lintel of the front door—1753, I think, three years more than a century since the house was built. When I was alone with the father, after dinner, I asked about it. When he took the house it had been uninhabited for many years; and, though in a good situation in every way, both it and the grounds round it had a bad name. There was nothing definite—some old ghost story—and he got it cheap. There was some trouble about servants, certainly; they would not sleep in the house; but that was got over by their all sleeping on a small farm he had bought near.

Among other stories told that evening I repeated one of Edgar Poe's—"The Startling Effects of Mesmerism on a Dying Man." None of them had ever heard it before, and even the father seemed interested. There was a silence of many seconds when I concluded, and then a rush of conversation on kindred topics.

"Do you know, my dears, that we are all living in a haunted house? or, rather, the house itself is not haunted, though the grounds are."

A little murmur of surprise, and each sat closer to the other.

"I dare say, my dears, you have heard your father say how very cheaply we have bought this property. No! Well, at any rate, it is on that account. He learnt that many years ago—you remember the date over the door—an old gentleman came and settled here with two sons. They seem to have lived a quiet solitary life. The old man died. The eldest son, then of an age to shift for himself, realised as much money as he could, and disappeared. The old people about here wil still talk of his wild daring and mad frolics. The other seems to have exhausted its energies in the property and married happily enough. I suspect the orangery and the little pier into the lake are his building; and perhaps we owe the long shady avenue up to the house to his or his wife's taste, and no doubt the old summer-house overlooking the lake was as favorite resort of hers as it is of with us.

One will evening the brother returned, and was heartily welcomed home. Their life would hardly seem to have been as quiet and happy as before; and yet his younger brother's sweet, homely little wife would appear unwillingly to have gained too much of his admiration. One evening, apparently, the two men were in the billiard-room alone, when the younger woman followed by the deep, short accents of hate, arose, and then a few quick blows and the unlike noise of fierce struggle. I can imagine her with clasped hands, trembling, trembling at the foot of the winding stone stairs. The door above opened, and her husband, with pallid face, sprang down and almost into her arms. 'Hide, Hilda, hide! or it will be worse for you than me!'

Stanford knew by the wild terror in his face and eye than by his words, she fled to her room, hearing the front door blown violently to by the wind. But her husband, wildly insane as soon rouse her, and while preparing to follow her husband she heard a heavy measured tread above her. Listening, she knew that it was her duty to go to his room, come down and go out. Follow him she must and did. Guided by the lantern he carried with him, she followed him to the pier, were wholly traced, she followed him round to the plantation behind the orangery. Here, with an oath, the light was dashed to the ground, and he, still stupped to the narrow by the cruel cold, she sprang forward, until the report of a pistol rang through the night air. She fell, and for a moment lay still to the earth, while the birds from the heronry close by, scared from their nests, wheeled round and round, uttering their discordant screams.

She came to herself again when all was silent, and struggled home, with a sensation as of a hand of ice on her heart. She met no one in the house. But at length her brother-in-law entered, flushed with labor and stained with earth. One glance assured Hilda of the truth, and she cried out. And with what cruel, hungry eye he must have looked at the only witness! Report says that she was locked into her room, and that he was released, and that there she died—faint whispers said of starvation. It is said by the old people here that the younger woman never afterwards left her chair the ring of the 26th of January, and that you know is a day on which they say a fight is always seen to bind the evening.

The father here chimed in, and declared that a short time after his arrival he was being driven home very late, and that he looked out of the came near the little bay, above which the house stands, they saw a bright light among the trees. The driver called attention to it, and on, and then, turning towards and, made a long detour through the woods, reaching the house with the greatest reluctance, and not until the light had ceased to be more substantial refreshment, drove off immediately he could. It was so odd that he entered it in his diary, yet, for some reason he had left out the book. We found it happened on the 26th of January. And while doing so we all remembered that we had also entered it on the anniversary of that day. I think we each saw that the other remembered too, but I, perhaps hardly believing in impiety for a jest, was the first to speak, was the first to mention it. As it was only ten minutes to twelve then, I proposed to wait till midnight, and meanwhile to look at the sketches that had been brought in early from the hall. Twelve o'clock and no light, for mama and I looked out. Papa said he was not comfortable at seeing anything but bed. Five minutes, ten minutes, a quarter, half-past, half-past, to we went to bed and slept soundly. Next morning mine was the room at the end of the second floor.

It could not have been long before I was aroused by a tapping at the door, and I recognised my hostess's voice.

"Look out of the window," she said, "towards the orangery, and tell me if you think we have seen aboard it described. I thought you would not believe us unless you saw it for yourself," she added, half apologetically.

I looked, and saw in the direction she mentioned a clear, round light, seemingly as bright and vivid as a powerful lamp. But it was not steady, for only a fook or two above the ground, and always remained near the same spot, rose and sank, gently revolving, quite unaffected by the brisk breeze still blowing.

I dressed hurriedly, in a strong sense of curiosity, not quite unlike that one feels for a practical joke or other imposition. Leaving my room, I announced to Mrs. Clayton my intention of going up to the light. She begged me to take no steps to do so; but I wrapped up well and sallied out, with only a scout walking-stick in my hand. The wind was blowing from the direction of the trees, shrill and sombre, were stripped of their snowy plumes. Across the sky flitted wild dishevelled clouds, from behind which the moon constantly shone out. Passing the angle of the house, I saw the clear, full, powerful light in the old place, a long way ahead. Slowly crossing the open ground behind the orangery, I endeavored to concentrate my mind on the object, and to make (for the wild night had swept away all idea of rising fog) out if but the story I had just heard came vividly upon my mind. Shrewdly, I imagined how he, how she had crossed this open plot once before, and as I did so I felt that sense of a presence near me that made my temples throb. I shall ever believe that I saw the shadowy outline of a crouching female form near me, passing with abrupt and unequal steps towards the plantation. Suddenly stretching forth his arms it sank forward, disappearing as does a snow-wreath when blown away, and the light seemed surged upwards red and angry.

You know my theory on so-called supernatural appearances. Recalling them to my mind, holding on as it were a mental armor, I approached and entered the dark belt of trees, all my attention fixed upon the light, which now seemed to rise higher than ever, diffusing itself as it did so into a luminous vapor that seemed drifting slowly towards me. I still advanced, though as I neared me a scorching chill reached the very marrow of my bones, while my temples throbbed feverishly. The dim vapor surging round and round, still spreading more and more, seemed to assume the misty outline of a human form, which, from the thicker mist, at its summit, I thought glared on me two eyes—two eyes so cruel and malevolent, so full of hate and deadly purpose, that my very reason told me that here was a living agency, most cruel and murderous, certainly, though unseen. I stretched my hand forward in resistance was necessary as though it were in flesh and blood. One faltering retrograde step I felt would be fatal. The cruel, unseen, living creature, to oppose this deadly hate, was my only course. Rigidly had those thoughts clearly formed themselves in my mind, when I was outlined a human figure before me lost its clearness, and the misty cloud surged round, drifting yet nearer down upon me again. It surrounded me, I felt its cruel eyes in its hazy folds, and the cruel eyes appeared at times close to mine, and then again far off.

A sharper pitch, whistle of the young trees were growing further on in the wood, appeared to me now like a heaven of safety, as the moonlight flickered through the branches, and I turned. As though my thoughts of escape were divined, the form again assumed its distinctness and bared its cruel eyes, but without a word. Then, with leaping wildly, I stepped out in its direction. As I approached the dim form I experienced a soft sensation, as then opening my eyes, startled by this new proof of living power, my knees knocked together, and involuntarily I stretched forth my hands. The cruel eyes were filled. With firm grasp, and the stick was slowly wrenched from my hand. With all my physical strength failing, I struck out blindly, and found I was not master of my own will. And then those cruel eyes, sinking down to a level with mine, fixed close up to me, and I felt a soft cold kiss on my forehead, and then momentarily seemed to tighten. With one wild effort I cried, "This is not fear; the body quivers, but the soul is free!" and then a strong lightning shot on my throat, and the air became clear about me. And with my knees knocking together, I stood alone, the light and misty moonlight, and sank for a time exhausted on the snow.

I do not think I could have lain there long before I recovered and went towards the house. The mental struggle over, the breezy night seemed fresh and pleasant to my fevered head; and when I met my anxious host and hostess at the door, I was able to offer a comfortable assumption of calmness, that I had certainly seen something strange, but nothing that need alarm them; and evading their further questions, I proceeded soon to my room. I found the next morning that such a visible corroboration of my statement was given by the scout, and which most of them had seen, had rather alarmed the younger, and very much astonished the elder of the family. On account of it, therefore, we looked for with a great deal of interest. It must have been an unaccountable phenomenon, one of nature's operations, and so I treated it as far as possible, there was little or nothing to tell; indeed the crouching phantom of my imagination seemed to them the most terrible part of the affair.

In clear daylight I visited the ground again, following my nearly-obliterated steps in the snow. I found that the light, as I had seen it from the middle of the fir trees, that I had so anxiously struggled towards, was but a little space, on a large open plot a few yards from the pier. I have mentioned that wherever there was a clear space in the pine forest bush trees sprang up, and in a birch wood pine trees always grew. Here, the young trees of the young trees had allowed the blessed moonlight to stream down, and form, as it had done for me, such a vivid light. It was a curious spot, and it must have been on the hither side of this space that I first saw the light, and there, too, was a large space covered with the dead leaves. I had experienced a slight tremor of the sensations I had experienced on the past night. You have heard me say that I am by no means a nervous man, will, however powerful and inexorable, can exert itself at a distance without some tangible material closely by, and I find no such thing here (I will explain my idea) as a starting point, as a fulcrum for its lever. I scrutinised everything around me closely, but could find no such thing. Those sensations told me I was not mistaken. I explained more fully to Mr. C. my ideas on the subject, and proposed to him that I should, if he thought necessary, to dig the ground I was standing on. He had no objection whatever. Some labourers were brought from the house, and in the afternoon hardly seemed to like the job; but I set the example, and he soon followed it. After about two hours' labor, about 3 feet beneath the frozen crust into the soft earth, and then she man got out of the hole, and declared he could dig no more. I do not know why—whether I was as I stepped down into his place, and felt a chill sensation of fear creep over me, I did not wonder. I felt no fear now, as the cool air refreshed me, a feeling, and I presently turned up a scrap of leather that had evidently formed part of a shoe or boot. Then a piece of rotten wood, and then in astonishment at my proceedings, and rather persuaded that I had in them, now himself became interested. Other and stranger things soon were brought to light, and before long we were all three working hard in the rapidly-increasing hole. In less than an hour we exposed the remains of a perfect human skeleton; and on clearing away the stringy fibre of roots that had interlaced themselves over it, we found a bullet still jammed under one of the little projections of the lowjohnes. As we lifted the skeleton out piecemeal, buttons and buckles were found under it, proving too clearly its hurried burial. And alongside it, still close by the long arm, was the broken hilt of a sword, hard, heavy wood, in which the lozenge-shaped pieces of mother-of-pearl with which it was ornamented still kept their places.

You can understand now, my friend, the train of thought that led me to enter, as I did, that man's room last night.

I proposed to Mr. Clayton to report the finding of the skeleton, hearing such marks as it did of a violent death, to the police authorities; but the expense and trouble this might have entailed no doubt prevented its being done. At any rate, the remains were buried in the little bay, and the same spot, and their position was simply marked by a wooden cross. I left the country very soon after, but kept up some letter correspondence with the old family; and I distinctly remember being told on two or three different occasions of the re-appearance of the mysterious light, and always about the same date. And indeed so convinced am I of the connection between your late patient and it, that should I have heard nothing for years of or from the Claytons, I will write to their house, on the chance of some of the family being still there; and I will communicate, thus hear something that bears upon the subject.

And about a month after my return to town I received from them through the following letter that I received from them:

"Ridgerville, March 5th, 1866.

"* * * Not that I have any complaint to make your letter being a very polite one, as you hardly ask me if I am after your old friends, and only seem to be curious about the mysterious light, but I think every year frightens the stupid servants out of the house. Only this year—this month—I have not really seen anxious to learn about it, I don't mind telling you, but I felt a sort of creepy feeling towards the end of January that we all got quite accustomed to it, and when the change came we missed it, and how few frightened us all about it; and when you dug up that skeleton too! Well, I am sure I thought the ghosts would have come with us, and since my dear husband's gone, I don't like the place myself, and I think we shall be going to be. My dear Mr. Tracey, there is nothing like a woman's home—a home! I am not a "man fru" and "var sa god," I can hardly make any one understand me. As for Lucy, she is as fond of the place as ever. She's approved of papa's talking before their mothers in a foreign language (Swedish, I think it is), and she's a little Scandinavia, though I like him very well, he is very kind to me, and in spite of his calling me "von" I don't like his speeches: I believe he sleeps in them, though they say he talks more after dinner than at any rate he is very clever, and mesmerises people, and all that; and hearing of the light, would not believe about it. I think it was staying here the month before last; and the next day I had the light dug out in the orangery, to "find out about the light" was scandalous. Well, I don't know, but I believe that the reason he was too when he did see it; for you must know that one evening we were sitting round the fire after tea, and papa was reading out loud, probably as possible, never minding a word of the conversation, when I heard them very distinctly to each other (for though I didn't understand it papa had been talking to me in English), and while staring out by the corner of the window-blind I saw the light in the old place, over the cross in the water. As soon as I was sure of it I told him, and after looking for a few minutes he left the room to go, but I knew he had not gone the silly girl stay by me, or she would have caught the light, and I don't know what she would have said about the dates, I remembered this happened the night the skeleton was discovered, and I thought I'd sleep there, and see the processions of students and so forth, on the next day, the old king's birthday, and Lucy, the light, and Mr. Vandusy, as you will remember. So what I am telling you must have been on the 28th.

Well, presently "von Edouard" came back, looking rather queer and said that a he was going across the open part on this side of the wood, he saw the light, and that it was "very fine," and that he seemed to flicker and wave about, and then rising quickly up, it went out suddenly, drifting down towards the bay and over the ice. That may be or not. To be sure I could not see the light when I looked across from the front, but then, I have seen it since; but all the same, I believe he was afraid to go up to it.

TOWN GOSSIP.

THE Marchioness demonstrated to Dick Swiveller how, by chipping orange peel into a glass of lemonade, and taking a little pepper, you could almost think you were drinking punch. In the same way we have been making a pretence of enjoying spring weather, and, indeed, we are not opening the parks for our coats a very little way, running back to the fire, and exclaiming, "Ah, this is almost like spring!" The thermometer has certainly been chamber, jog down its pole a bit, merely out of sympathy with the sun, which, in the morning breath down into the one and the other, for more amazing acrobatics at the end of the month, when the sun is still as out of the question as the money to buy it with.

Anticipating the musical graces of May, the songsters of the opera-house have been giving us a taste of their full color in the down that arises as they turn on the gas-taps. "Lucia di Lammermoor," "Verdi," "La Forza del Destino," has taken its impregnable position as a "rage." It crams the house with its rich sensational music, its fine dresses, its excitement, and Signor Carozzi-Zucchi. It is made to please a New York audience. It is a play of very sad colors, where those who despise a wing may get a dramatist, and those who care little for a heart may mouth off with a mercenary bravo. It is a play of which the best part is to sing.

Singular enough, between two representations of this somber old Spanish story, seemed the trifling melodious and simple plot of vaudeville and jealousy in the "Somnambule," at Niblo's Garden, and in the person of the graces of the storm. How delicately, and with what a light touch, the fairy step and trip through the part of Amina. Nobody ever carried off the defect of vocal power with a more sprightly effervescence of will and acting, and brightly colored acting. The two prima donnas—neither of them "first prima," as we freely admit—are so admirably typical of their respective nationality, that any man of sensible taste may enjoy a study of each in succession. There stands the superb Italian, with her eyes, and her hair, and her passions—and her temper, too, and her jets Mediterranean; at her opposite, musing and warbling, with her refined American bow, her chin, her feminine reserve, and a seeming in every posture of her slender hand. We, our own self, are right proud of the beautiful little ballad-singer we have got at home, who can also carry well enough on the alternate nights, the frank objective passion and organ volume of the southern contadine.

But a terrible ordeal and equitable critic has been saying that Kellogg acts unsympathetic ally. It has set us to thinking a bit. So if you will kindly say yes to the next paragraph, we will have out our thinking cement-ed by concert. Just the clear sense of your assistance. Is the American character truly going off into the sulks? Is it true that the city now is so completely raised over the effects of national genius in these soon days of Sumter and Sisera? Is every mind engaged, or even a mass, but obsessed, nearer to forbid that he has not a mind? Is it true that the great Republic has that arose before his memory while he sat among the pandemonium of the Tuileries? His supervisal of the material business actually overtakes the national muse?

Is it true that the American name of music means a haunting sense of this very criticism creeps along with the Atlantic cable? Is it true that the Fine Arts Flowers carves regulatively, but leaves a chill. Crawford, in his studio, is working, and a design for a fountain will ever climb the mountain of the capitol to which Washington is to be elevated? Powers has completed, leaves the reader slumbering in his very marrow. The same "cold" is spreadable just the same. Hiram Powers, headed by Holmes, with his infernal Lucifer, Church with his Heart of the Andes, Huntington with his Mary Magdalene, and a forgotten, evidently exiled Rogers, with his exquisite face can represent every feeling but tenderness. And as for Mr. Gothic Walter, he is the very marvel of intricate manipulation. As our very best man in Rome, he enjoys opportunities for observation at their triumphs in every direction, well he may. Even the Rome of Hawthorne's confounded blunders, more than heaven has forbidden yet to be seriousness, growing more and more worthy of the old saying, touching genius to the pressus. And so an exquisitely pretty and graceful Miss Hosmer, who has only to step across out to the footgate and run us with her sweet coo of a laugh. Miss Hosmer, however fashionable and the fayre, who will have eminent spiritual appetites, go off in troops to Rome, and bring back the fever for the Eternal City, and Italy, with the fine taste, and the brain that you could not get from Italy.

But it is Lent, and we do not go to the opera. Or at least we do not go to the opera. Gothic Walter is not over here now, so that we can almost feel as if we were in Rome. Even the Lenten fare is not "scientifically delicate of nature." As the venison steak, the juicy sirloin, and the fat turkey are confounded and banished from our deliverers crusading in tall sweet, their silver forks and spoons, and the fish are left to the fancies of the writer. We hardly ever saw anything brighter or more delicate than the fish that were served at our order around the purpose about the middle of the evening. Even the glow and color of the wine made them look so bright. We said as much to the cranky and accomplished host, who sat at the head of one side in a box. Yes, he told us it was the Years of the Lord, and that he had been praying for it all night, and now upon their incense. Then we tried something else. "Ah," he said, "you should have been here on the day of poetry, got up with rice powder and cream, rather disposed to be fat, and dressing and undressing and undressing as much of the longer who sased for his pudding and his pipe, and his tobacco, and his wife, and his children, and saw no more of him until three o'clock, when he came down to dinner, arrayed with that of some different ladies' dresses, and a little the better for sobriety. Then we had a conversation that was not quite so full of pleasantest we ever attended, the music repeatedly being interrupted by the fact that there was no encore.

We were also, with the privileged whiguity of our kind, favored for half an hour with the Swedish nightingale who had a gay impromptu carnival the same night at the Academy of Music. There was a great deal of fashionable dressing and fun, and the witty Tedesco, who are tenderly fond of Jenny Lind, and who has written her many inexplicable insults, only spoiled by certain rather grotesque flights of fancy upon our world's goddess, which grated upon the tastes of a portion of the guests.

Mrs. Lander, the wife of Frederick, and who plays the violoncello, has been with us during the week. We were not able to get up a concert as we had at first determined might be, and devoted two evenings to the investigation. Mrs. Lander is a very pretty woman, and plays and sings something very nice. The lady plays with great agility, and has a very fine voice, and executes some very fine and lumbering implement. Which, who assists her, is an accomplished musician, and his performance is always brilliant; and he hobnailed mashpintoish perhaps equal to any violoncello player out in this country.

Mr. Lander, too, Davenport, has been enrapturing her audiences in the West, and we are told that she has made completely her own. We refer to "Cinderella" and "Ici on parle Français," in "Black and White." The latter character she sustained with the most exquisite delicacy. Mr. Lander is a gentleman of the old nations during the week—once for the benefit of Shakespeare, and once for Sheridan. Of course, we always happy to herald a return to the legitimate drama, and to welcome any one who will bring it to us, but we have our own private and personal opinion, that Mrs. Lander is not the best exponent on the part of Shakespeare's female the American public.

Mr. Lander has made his tasteful Lecture Room with the great crowds who flock to see that the and Mr. Lander's "Pictures of Home Scene, and Sketches of Women of New York." It is a fashionably moral joy, in which the ladies and gentlemen of the Lander family are zealously rewarded by going through a mild and cosing series of tableaux, in which the wife and husband, and children, and servants, and all, are duly and fondly worshipped. So everybody is satisfied. The squash pie and the pumpkin pie are not disturbed, and the regional polyglot giant Goshen, weeps, in shocks to depart, with the consolation of carrying up the old night of the handsome face.

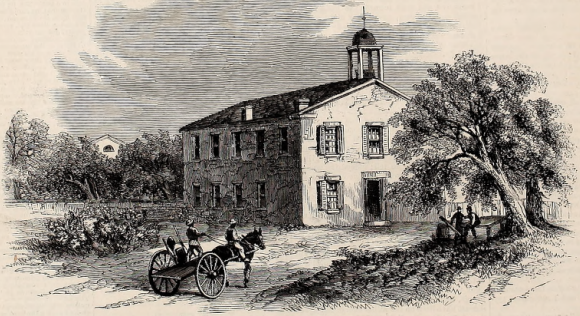
The Great Moral Exhibition is also about to close. The great moral display and, Hannibal, is going to work in the provinces, and to expand more gifted world. The great moral genius will browse from some other calling; and the great moral genius will be sent to the provinces for the improvement of a different class of youngsters, and the great moral peculiarities going to the provinces to Hannibal.

In our courts, the most striking Sundays and Jarndyce and Jarndyce case is that in America to American its cause. We refer to the Will case of Edwin B. Christy, deceased, which has been occupying the attention of Judge Ingraham's Special Term for two whole years, until now it is to be finally settled, and the case stands at high odds. Those who are fond of cases using testimony can find no better than the case now before the court. The issues, of great interest, are clearly defined, and the counsel on both sides are of the highest order. The case will be heard on Friday and Saturday.

The splendid and gorgeous ritual of the Greek church had its first exposition in America on Thursday, the 8th inst., when the Russian Emperor, a complete service was performed, with prayers for the family of Alexander II. The ceremonial took place in Trinity Church, a visiting priest of the Orthodox Oriental church, now in the city, officiating. The service was a mixture of Solovonic and English, and attracted a large crowd.

As we write the concluding words the vast procession in honor of the re-inauguration is rolling through the crowd, shining in the brilliant weather like an immense constellation. But as everybody in the city is now in the procession, we must leave the host and go adding the testimony of our more gossipy eye, and generously behave.

ARMY OF THE JAMES—WINTER CAMP.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.



WROUGHT IRON SHIELD FOR THE CRONSTADT FORTIFICATIONS.

The present war has given a wonderful impetus to all discussions respecting artillery practice and the means of resisting bombardments. The recent brilliant achievements of our navy, under Farragut and Porter, have more than ever called the attention of European Governments to this most important branch of warfare. Our successes during the last two years have entirely overthrown all their previous calculations, and the London papers are constantly giving the results of the most costly experiments made by the British Government testing the efficacy of defensive armor. The same experiments are being carried on in the French dockyards, but the profoundest silence is observed as to the results. Judging from the failure of all their great armor ships, it would not appear they have been more successful than their neighbors across the Channel.

The Russian Government has evidently come to the conclusion that the walls of Cronstadt will not be so secure in the event of another war as they were when Admiral Napier told his Jack Tars to sharpen their cutlasses. It has therefore had several defensive iron works constructed in London; one of these we present to our readers in this number, as the one esteemed the best by the most eminent engineers of Europe. There is no question that before many years have elapsed we shall have portable fortifications constructed on the same plan.

COURT-HOUSE, SMITHVILLE, N. C.

SMITHVILLE, one of the oldest and most dilapidated villages in the South, is situated on the Cape Fear river, about two miles from the Atlantic. It has a population of about 600 persons, most of whom are engaged in fishing. The Court-House will give our readers an idea of its general appearance. One of the apartments in the building was used as a shoe store, the rest being devoted to the Court offices. When our Artist visited it piles of public documents were strewn over the floors, some of them very old, dating as far back as the early Revolutionary times.

COURT-HOUSE AT SMITHVILLE, NEAR WILMINGTON, N. C.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

HOW TO PREVENT A DIVORCE.—When the senior Jonathan Trumbull was Governor of Connecticut, a gentleman called at his house, requesting to see his excellency in private. Accordingly he was shown into his sanctum sanctorum; and the Governor came forward to meet Squire W., saying, "Good morning, sir; I am glad to see you." Squire W. returned the salutation, adding as he did so, "I have called upon a very unpleasant errand, sir, and want your advice. My wife and I do not live happily together, and I am thinking of getting a divorce. What do you advise, sir?" The Governor sat a few moments in deep thought, then turning to Squire W., said: "How did you treat Mrs. W. when you were courting her? and how did you feel towards her at the time of your marriage?" Squire W. replied: "I treated her as kindly as I could, for I loved her dearly at that time." "Well, sir," said the Governor, "go home and court her now just as you did then, and love her as when you married her. Do this in the fear of God for one year, and then tell me the result." The Governor then said, "Let us pray." They bowed in prayer and separated. When a year had passed away, Squire W. called again to see the Governor, and grasping his hand, said: "I have called, sir, to thank you for the good advice you gave me, and to tell you that my wife and I are as happy as when first we were married. I cannot be grateful enough for your good council." "I am glad to hear it, Mr. W., and hope that you will continue to court your wife as long as you live." The result was that Squire W. and his wife lived happily together to the end of life. Let those who are thinking of separation in these days go and do likewise.

AMONG the numerous purposes to which photography has been applied, may now be included that of, so to speak, surveying, or mapping a country. Taking advantages of the physical conformation of the country around Grenoble, France, which is extremely mountainous, Capt. Javary has succeeded in making an admirable photographic survey of Grenoble and its environs. Eighteen different stations, at various elevations, were selected, and the result is, a map in which all the outward physical features of the country are represented with microscopical minuteness.

ARMY OF THE JAMES—HAULING CLAY TO BUILD WINTER HUTS.

ARMY OF THE JAMES—SPLITTING SHINGLES TO THATCH WINTER HUTS.

FISH MARKET AT CITY POINT, JAMES RIVER, VA.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, JOSEPH BECKER.

CAMP SCENES.

Army of the James.

THERE is a certain charm in all adventure, which frequently hides the danger; otherwise, how account for that disregard of comfort which makes sailors and soldiers of our citizens? Our Artist has sent us some sketches representing a camp in a snowstorm, and a very cheerless thing we should think it were we obliged to pitch our tent in the open air.

Our Artist writes: "You would hardly believe the alacrity with which our brave boys, most of whom have been accustomed to all the luxuries of a city life, go to work and pile the clay into their trucks to build the lower part of their winter huts. I have sent also a sketch representing them at work making the shingles for the roof. It is amusing to see with what an air of satisfaction they look around them when their work is completed, and they sit down to take their first smoke in their new habitation. Truly, every man is a Robinson Crusoe to a certain extent."

Fish Market, City Point.

War has its comedy as well as its tragedy, and few scenes are more comic than those daily seen at the fish market on City Point. There is not much variety, to be sure, for the article is almost invariably codfish, but it is fresh, being generally pulled out that morning from the James river. It is very amusing to hear the bargainings between the seller and the buyer. Sometimes it does not take the most placid turn, and many an angry discussion is heard between the exorbitant owner and the would-be purchaser. Our Artist has given a very life-like sketch of this modern Billingsgate.

REBEL WORKS ON CAPE FEAR RIVER, NEAR WILMINGTON, N. C.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

UNION GUNBOATS

Shelling the Rebel Idlers on Cape Fear River.

OUR readers will perceive that there has seldom been a campaign in which the two arms of the service have been so equally and gloriously employed as in the recent one against Wilmington and its defences. Indeed, it is only justice to both branches to say that neither could have achieved success without the other. Our sketch represents the Union gunboats shelling the rebel works, which were made to prevent the advance of our troops against Wilmington. It is somewhat remarkable that, as our gunboats are generally in direct range of the enemy's guns, so few casualties occur. Indeed, in the late attack on the Cape Fear defences more injury was done by the bursting of our own guns than was inflicted by those of the enemy.

THE ROPE-TYING FEAT.—The following description of the way in which the rope-tying feat is performed may interest some of our readers: The rope should be of a firm, smooth quality, about five or six yards long. Take it by the left hand in the centre, holding it between the left thumb and forefinger perpendicularly before you. Take hold with the right hand of the upper end of the rope, about a foot above where you are holding with the left hand; bring the two thumbs together, placing the portion of rope in the right hand behind the portion already under the left thumb; this will make a loop about four inches in diameter leaning on the left hand side of the first end of the rope, which is still hanging straight before you; then pass the second end over the thumb and through the loop, and pull the end through; then pass the right hand about six inches along the second end, and double it into a loop, and pass the double portion over the right hand under the portion covering the left thumb, in the direction of the loop already formed in the left hand, letting the second end hang down in the centre between the two first ends; pull tight, and the knot portions of the loops, and the knot is complete. You will then have two loops large enough to pass the hands through, and the two long ends which will slip freely to and fro when you hold the knot. When the lights are extinguished, the operator first of all makes the knot, he then passes one of the ends of the rope through each of the holes in the seat, or through the carved back of a chair. He then knots the two ends together in a few inches underneath. This is apparently to prevent it, the operator rising from the seat, but not enabling him to get a straight pull on both loops. He then, unassisted, the cords not tied tight round the ankles, then brought up to the knees, secured fastened round them, and the ends fastened anywhere, it does not matter where, so that they cannot be reached by the mouth. The operator then thrusts his hands into the loops, extends his legs as much as they can be found, and is drawn tight, the lights are called for, and he is found, not only apparently, but really, tightly bound. Exactly, tightly bound. Exactly, to extinguish the lights, and in the twinkling of an eye the legs are relaxed, the loops are slackened, the hands withdrawn, and the operator is free to wave guitars, to play tambourines, to take off his coat, to touch anybody he can reach, to strike objectionable committee-men sharply on the head, and, in fact, to do anything that the spiritual agency or the new physical force is supposed to do for him.

THE following anecdote of Count Fourtalès, whose gallery occupies so much attention at this moment, gives one a charming idea of the man himself—therefore I repeat it: The count's attention was attracted to the works of a young artist, exhibited for the first time at the salon, the name was then unknown, and it was with some difficulty the count procured his address. He wrote to request the young artist to bring one of the pictures exhibited to his house, which request was at once acceded to.

"I should like to add your picture to my collection, sir," said the count; "may I venture to inquire its price?"

"Two thousand francs,"

THE GENERAL HOSPITAL AT SAVANNAH, GA., NOW OCCUPIED BY OUR SICK AND WOUNDED.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

replied the youngman, debating within himself whether he had not ventured on too large a sum.

"Ten thousand francs," replied the great man, ringing temporary deafness. "Very well, then, consider the transaction as settled."

The artist, unwilling to benefit by a mistake, at once explained the error as to francs (the count had counted).

"Pardon," interrupted M. de Fourtabis, "je ne marchande jamais"—I never bargain.

SHOPPING IN JERUSALEM.

Tyre is a ditch in the centre of most of the streets, but there are no sidewalks as to pavements, for the unevenly laid stones do not deserve the name, nor are there any lamp-posts. At night no one here and there the dim flickering of a little earthen lamp of olive oil beside a reclining figure of a man, who has sleeping upon a raised platform in front of his bazaar, and this is the only light one enjoys in a nocturnal walk through the city. House to house visiting or carrying out any knowledge which is still further enforced by the regulation inflicting fine and imprisonment upon all who are caught in the street without a light after an early hour.

The streets are lined with bare stone walls of prison-like houses, by every few and very small latticed windows, and covered usually with arches or pieces of masonry, connecting the houses, and the streets are more loosely proclaim the merits of their wares. Country women are also to be met at either side of the streets, baskets of fruits and of vegetables. The shops of the Aegyptian bazaars are nothing more than open stone platforms, four or five feet square with shelves arranged around, on which are placed the goods to sell. The parchment stands in the street, while the merchant performs his work on a rug spread over the platform. With utter indifference he lays aside his turquoise, and at first sneers at the customer whether he buy or not, but presently launches into great volubility on the excellence of his fabrics, and the cheapness at which he offers them to trade, but often makes a great display of richly embroidered robes, and beautiful shawls and head-dresses, which, although embroidered in gold, is of the coarsest cotton, yet to the unpracticed eye appears rich. It reminds me of among other purchases of one of my companions of a pair of white cotton, with which I had intended making my best robe of black silk!

Displayed on the shelves are handsome the shelves —some of them gilded morocco, without ornament, but of the richest quality, and perfectly soft and pliant, including colored stones; embroidered jackets of purple cloth, trimmed with tinsel lace, and with gold and silk braid; scraps of scarlet cloth with light raised gold patterns, and some had a pale blue and striped silk sashes from Damascus; napkins perfumed with otto of rose, and embroidered in the most ready made trousers, and red fez caps with tassels. Calicoes are not cheap, but linens very much so, and their prices are nearly as high as those of silks.

Besides the above, there are also pipes and glass narghilehs, and little coffee-cup stands of richly embossed silver—the owner's prejudices of a religious character notwithstanding. For these they cry one penny, or five cents, which is the price of a cup of coffee, very delicious, by the way. Further, on the respectable Armenian street, are flowering small trees and shrubs with his scanty supply of merchandise, and those of the richest incrustation. With these, the owner sits, or rises, or sets as suits, with wonderful skill.

Interspersed among these are shops where numbers of beads are displayed, made of cocoa's bone, shells, amulets and talismans, and these are manufactured in stones from India, and baskets of pearl, made by the Bethlehemites, in imitation of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and a long catalogue of all that which are in great demand among the several pilgrims. Of course there a man may be seen standing by a small earthen furnace of charcoal, in which he burns a few coals, with small pieces of mutton—a very popular dish. The bazaar is already crowded with various nationalities of pilgrims from all parts of the world, and the air resounds with the sounds of camel and donkey drivers, "Bosh! bosh!" "Yaqua!" they cry—"stand aside, stand aside!" "Bosh!" which, united to the babel of tongues and the fierce gesticulation characteristic of Orientals, present a scene of noise and confusion impossible to describe. Add to this the braying of donkeys, the cries of camels, the chattering of men and women on the streets, one's nose to avoid, at every step, the accumulated filth of ages, and dodging the mud, and you get the sun parching through the ragged matting overhead, and you have a faint picture of what the pilgrim must withstand to participate in the reality.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

THE DAILY News says: "The fall of Charleston is a mere matter of Sherman's pen," in the style of Lord's strategy. Who gives a castle looks to gain a queen."

WHY is McClellan like Job's horse? Because he smelt the battle from afar.

WE offer the following item as a hint to the ingenious Doolys, whose magic wheel was the sensation of Baltimore, and to the ornament of the Capital, the Emperor presented to the son of Prince Napoleon an automaton, which, by touching a spring, could walk now. The figure walks backwards and forwards, and turns at the door and returns in the same way. Nothing more whatever. Nothing before it whatever may be put in the box. A figure of a child, they think he has seen the shows, and it is of the very simplest mechanism.

GEN. BUTLER has humorously suggested an epitaph for himself, as follows: "Died at Fortress Monroe, on the 9th inst., the military career of Major-Gen. B. F. Butler, of negligent shock of the republic army."

DOUGLAS JERROLD once said to an ardent young gentleman who was desirous of seeing his name in print, "Get yourself by turns into a scrape, and then down the shutters before there is something in the window."

Punch gives utterance to the following, on Lord Derby's resignation:

When Lord Derby of late
Sooner than could be translated,
Some grim old shocking mood silly had,
For his knee, there's no goods,
And he's off his legs.

Since old governors the country as like-had.

THE ex-Confederate Secretary of War Boyle Rocke: "Mr Speaker, I small a rat; I see him coming in the air, but I can't see who. I shall yet nip him in the bud." He evidently the model upon which a writer in Kansas framed, the other day, some remarks upon the recent election. The Leavenworth Conservative says, that by the result of that election, "the fell of corruption has been dispelled, and the wheels of the State Government will no longer be trammelled by cracks that have beset the public prosperity like locusts."

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical
PINEAPPLE CIDER
is a PREVENTIVE OF SICKNESS. The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years enables him to offer to the public a Medicinal article offered that will prevent sickness. The article offered in Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider is composed of all choice, old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but is entirely new to the world. It is a Medicine that will do a well person one year. This is rather a new mode of doctoring; nevertheless, it is the true principle of doctoring sick. It is a better to pay three dollars a year to keep well than to pay three dollars a day for sickness to the doctor's bills, and to such more for the loss of time and the inconvenience of being sick? The present inclination is as follows: And one teaspoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the first thing after you rise in the morning, and the same before you retire at night. Dr. Talbot's Medicated Cider and give vigor and action to the whole system. Dr. Talbot has made a thorough and extensive trial of the Pineapple Cider, and is satisfied that it will do for any person of ordinary health at the first trial. He will continue to use as a very valuable remedy for Dyspepsia, and will recommend on entire preventive to sickness in his cases. Any person wishing to try the Medicated Cider can send to New York and has not been sick one day during the last year.
Price Eight dollars per gallon; four dollars per half gallon; two pint bottles, two pint bottles, or four half-pint bottles, sent to any address on receipt of price. All orders should be addressed to

During the month ending February 28, 1865, T. & H. GAUGHAN & CO. have had the honor of distributing among their patrons ONE HUNDRED AND NINETEEN GOLD AND SILVER WATCHES, at the Price of One Dollar each! We subjoin a few of many favorable

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS:

"This is one of the largest firms in the City of New York, and are doing a very extensive business, and have on hand the largest stock that can be found in that city."—Oceana Times, Pent Water, Mich., Oct. 21, 1864.

"Their Stock is large, and buyers may rely upon finding articles purchased from them just as represented. Their long continuance in business enables them to offer better inducements than any other house in the city."—Loyal American, Anderson, Ind., Oct. 20, 1864.

"Their Watches are admitted by competent judges, and those who have used them, to be the best in use. They are all they are advertised to be."—Independent, Warren, Ill., Oct. 20, 1864.

"They are large dealers, and their stock is manufactured in the best style and of pure materials."—Telegraph, Saugerties, N. Y., Oct. 24, 1864.

CAUTION
FROM
THE AMERICAN WATCH CO.

It having come to our knowledge that imitations of the American Watch have been put upon the market in great numbers, fabricated by their utter worthlessness to injure the reputation of our genuine products, to protect our own interests and the public from imposition, we again publish the trade marks by which our Watches may invariably be known.

We manufacture four styles of Watches.

The trade has the name

"AMERICAN WATCH CO., Waltham, Mass.," engraved on the inside plate.

The vernier has the name

"APPLETON, TRACY & CO., Waltham, Mass.," engraved on the inside plate.

The vernier has the name

"P. S. BARTLETT, Waltham, Mass.," engraved on the inside plate.

All the above styles have the name American Watch Co. painted on the dial, and are warranted in every respect.

The vernier has the name

"WM. ELLERY, Roxbury, Mass.," engraved on the inside plate, and is not named on the dial.

All the above-described Watches are made of various sizes, and are sold in gold or silver cases, as may be required.

It is hardly possible for us to accurately describe the numerous imitations to which we have alluded. They are usually furnished with names so nearly approaching our own as to escape the observation of the unaccustomed buyer. Some are represented as made by the "Union Watch Co. of Boston, Mass."—no such company existing. Some are named the "Soldier's Watch," to be sold as our Fourth or Wm. Ellery style, usually known as the "soldier's Watch" others are named the "Appleton Watch Co.," others the "P. S. Bartlet," instead of our P. S. Bartlett, besides many varieties named in such a manner as to convey the idea that they are the veritable productions of the American Watch Company.

We also caution the public, and particularly soldiers, against buying certain articles called watches as freely advertised in illustrated papers as "Army Watches," "Officers' Watches," "Magic Time Observers," "Arcana Watches," &c., the prices of which are stated to be from $7 to $16. A good watch in those times cannot be afforded for any such money.

A little attention on the part of the buyers will protect them from gross imposition.

ARCANA WATCH.
An Elegant Novelty in Watches.
The cases of this watch are an entirely new invention, composed of six different metals combined, rolled together and planished, producing an exact imitation of 18 carat gold, called Arcana, which will always keep its color. They are as beautiful and durable as solid gold, and are afforded at one-eighth the cost. The case is beautifully designed, with Pearl and Shield for name, with Patent Push Pin, and engraved in the exact style of the celebrated Gold Hunting Levers, and are really handsome and desirable, and an exact an imitation of gold, as to defy detection. The movement is manufactured by the well-known St. Jimer Watch Company of Geneva, and are superbly finished, having engraved plates, fancy carved bridges, adjusting regulator, with gold balance and the improved ruby jewelled action, with fine dial and skeleton hands, and is warranted a good timekeeper. The watches are of three different sizes, thermalised being for ladies, and are all Hunting Cases. A case of six will be sent by mail or Express for $125. A single one sent in an elegant Morocco Case for $25, will readily sell for three times their cost. We are the sole agents for the watch in the United States, and none are genuine which do not bear our Trade Mark.

Our Twentieth Volume.

The present number commences the 20th volume of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER. Having reached a position never before obtained by any illustrated newspaper on this continent, we may be pardoned if we remark that to achieve this proud distinction we have spared no effort, no talent, no expense, and we believe we now present the public, week by week, a pictorial record of all that is existing, absorbing, curious or important in the events of the day. In these respects it is no complete or to be really called, ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF OUR OWN TIMES.

During the present civil war, our Artists have been wherever any operations were in progress, and we can fairly affirm that no military or naval expedition of any importance has been without an Artist of acknowledged ability and experience from this establishment. Besides the every week's issue of the numberless instances, voluntarily attested the the spirit and fidelity of our sketches. This has been so well understood in Europe that they are constantly copied by the Illustrated Papers of London, Paris and Leipsic. This testimony to the superiority of our paper over all others has been gained at an immense outlay, and the ongoing expenditure is comprise; over 80 Artists having been employed since the commencement of the war in making sketches for our pages.

The war correspondents of the public press are constantly referring to the presence and activity of our Special Artists—the latest instance being in the New York Tribune, who, in writing from Charleston, says, "There are now here two Artists of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, making sketches of all that is interesting," etc.

Nor is our ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER less attractive in its other features. It is the only one of the kind in America whose contents are entirely original. Every number contains an original poem, beautifully illustrated, an original story, with two striking illustrations, besides shorter original stories, sketches, &c., with a complete digest of the week's news, &c. It likewise contains a continued romance of great power by one of the first of living writers.

Those whose subscriptions expire with the volume should renew them at once, to avoid interruption in receiving the paper, as it is always next to impossible for us to supply back numbers.

Russia and the United States are the only two great progressive nations of the age. Both move in the same general line of amelioration of the condition of man, though the forms of government differ, it is only because each has to deal with men under different aspects and conditions, and under different moral, social and mental states. Russia is tearing an Empire from little less than barbarism, educating it up gradually to an appreciation of the rights of man, and consolidating it as well as the benefits of self-government. The United States started on its career of national glory with institutions already in advance of those of Russia, but, as we have already said, both nations have moved—widely apart it is true—but in converging directions, and they are both moving to a common goal. It is natural that there should exist a deep sympathy between them. Each appreciates and values the other at its true worth. To-day in that the world is wide enough for both. In the intercourse between the two there is no arrière pensée holding. Each is open, honest and frank. Russia, tending politically in the same direction, albeit with many degrees of difference in the road, is the natural friend of the nation which should take stand on every point of ground common to both, and seek to still further harmonize their relations, social and moral, as well as political. For example: after a careful and prayerful scrutiny of the Creek religion, that which prevails in Russia, we have recently established a church in city, as represented by the clergy and vestry of Trinity Church, admitted the full rehearsal of the Greek ritual in the presence of the service in its own chapel on the 1st of March. A daily contemporary tells us that Father Agapius, the Russian Priest who officiated on the occasion in Trinity Chapel, "has been admitted into the full fellowship of the Episcopal Church." The same journal continues:

"It is a just matter of congratulation that the American Church recognizing the value of the new bond, has taken this step to cement more closely the Christian union. The Russian people are drawn by natural sympathies toward this country. The great emancipation movement in Russia proceeded that of America, but both nations now keep step in the march of progress. There is no reason why a church established in this country, for no rancor born of war stirs the bloor of the people. The practical lightning of Science in the interest and political stabilities, social harmony and moral strength, is one of the grand arms of our day."

It is a pity that neither circumstance nor a just regard for our public duty will permit us to follow the example of the sons of Noah, and cover up the disgraceful nudity of our contemporary the President. Men, however low their origin or vulgar their station and habits, generally rise to a respectable degree of decency at times when they called to high station, and in their exterior and public deportment carry themselves with a certain respect for the proprieties and decencies conditions of society. Mr. Vice President Johnson, on the occasion of his inauguration, failed in this most obvious duty, and not content with thus degrading himself, with maudlin emphasis and reiteration, "apleb-ized," evinced by actions more positive and demonstrative that he was a low-bred man of the lowest and most disgraceful of vices, unrestrained equally by self-respect or regard for public opinion. We sincerely commend to the consideration of, and shrink from the loathsome duty of referring to the humiliating scene in the Senate Chamber, on the 4th of March, and the still more base one when silence becomes a crime, and we are compelled to swell the deep stern voice of reprobation which rises from all parts of our outraged country, against a repetition of the spectacle of a drunken man mumbling inarticulately the solemn oath which binds the Executive officer of the day to the United States. Mr. Vice-President Johnson has four years wherein through dignified and sober conduct to redeem the character of the day which he brought a blush to every American cheek, and contempt on the second office within the gift of the nation.

There is, to our minds, a well-founded distinction between the purely legal position assigned by section of the so-called Congress at Richmond, made up of representatives from States which have not seceded, and recognized as the "Confederacy" than those of Germany. It is not surprising that North Carolina, Alabama and Georgia are sending a delegation under parole of professing to represent Kentucky, Missouri, Tennessee, Arkansas, etc., which are as much out of the "Confederacy" as Vermont and New York. Mr. Brown, of Georgia, complains, and not unreasonably, that "Much of our most objectionable legislation is fastened upon us by the voice of representatives who, however patriotic and true to our cause, act without responsibility to any constituency, and out of the army, who can be affected thereby, and who can neither visit with safety, nor show themselves publicly among the people whom they profess to represent, a majority of whom have given the strongest evidence of sympathy and support to the Government of the United States, and have been constantly represented in the Congress of those States."

The rebellion has a significant dread of State Conventions, which means that it has a dread of the spirit of States Rights wherewith it conjured so long, and threw in the means of which it broke up, or sought to break up, "the best Government the world ever saw." We have always maintained that the principle of secession would be the destruction of Socesia, and results justify our predictions. It is without surprise, therefore, that we find Governor Brown, governor elect of Georgia, that, "No Convention is now wanted in Virginia. A convention will not fight, but it might run away. There is no policy in a State when that alternative shall come. Gen. Lee is the proper Convention, he is the best judge of our situation. No Convention of Georgia, for what does State Sovereignty need in a Convention? Has not State Sovereignty been the weakness of our cause? Our cause to-day needs power."

We have had occasion to remark how patiently and with what patriotic forbearance our people have endured high-handed acts of power and encroachments on individual and guaranteed rights, in a manner almost unexampled from the circumstances in which the country has been placed, and to which they have submitted with little or no complaint, in the interests of harmonizes in Government and those in authority. The necessity for the exercise of arbitrary authority, if it ever really existed, has passed away, with the return of peace it behoves us to see to it that power shall take no immunity from the fact that its illegitimate exercise was tacitly endured and will-out more than a passing protest. We are pleased to read, in the report of the speech of Mr. David Dudley Field, made on the occasion of the great patriotic demonstration in this city:

"After finishing the war we shall still have the great work of settling the Union, a great nation of thirty-six States to be united, peaceful and prosperous; we are to preserve the rights and liberties of individuals as clearly defined and as firmly guaranteed as the rights of the nation. Among the rights we are to preserve shall be remembered only to be avoided. There have been acts of power which must not be drawn into precedent. We must remember that this complex system can not exist if any State shall claim for itself the sweep compatible with the greatest strength of the nation, is the indissoluble connection with the slavery which is destructibility of the States, and that there can be no true Union if any State or any portion of them are subject to the arbitrary will of any other person."

The Southern Senate has almost a monopoly of those flowers of rhetoric which used to bloom in our Capitol, when "all the chivalry" dominated the Senate. The Capital of Virginia, recently delivered a speech in Richmond, apropos of Mr. Jefferson Davis, in which the statement of the Rev. Dr. Hoge should be explained and by it the rebellion succeed was characterised as "another phosphorescent emanation from passionate Virginia, which will soon and fiery out in the cockcs' or disordered imagination!"

The ephemeral empire of Maximilian is taking precisely the course which will seemest bring its wretched existence to an end. It has already pronounced a long series of arbitrary acts towards the country which will make its squelching out an early if not immediate necessity. It is authoritatively stated that the city of Mexico has refused is directed to arrest all persons who express sympathy with the Union cause, and one man has been sentenced to a year's imprisonment for predicting the speedy end of the rebellion. We do not blame Maximilian for hating us, for he well knows that our principles are fatal to his existence on this continent, to the shaded in our convenience, but it seems impolitic for him to precipitate his fate by making himself unnecessarily disagreeable.

Baron Muller, in his Mexican travels, pretends to have found a real tea plant, or rather the leaves of it, in Guatemala. He was, he says, in the house of a painter, who offered him some, and he says: "Through politeness I tasted the unadulterated, and found there must be some mistake, because the beverage appeared to me a good sort of Souchong, but the painter pressed me to take some more, and gave me a basket full of the leaves; he even let me have half a pound of it, and I had a difficulty in inducing him to accept the money. It is the real Chinese tea oosta, from three to four dollars a pound in Europe, I cannot suppose that the man gave me anything in exchange, for it does not differ in taste and smell from real Chinese tea, and connoisseurs whom I allowed to taste it, declared that it surpassed its excellent quality." Unfortunately, our author confesses that he did not meet with the plant itself, but was said to grow abundantly in the surrounding hills. A closer investigation would have repaid the loss of time, and the owner of the tea could have pointed out the Indians who gathered it for him.

Mr. Wm. H. Powell's "Battle of Lake Erie," lately painted by him for the State of Ohio, and for some time exhibited in the Rotunda of the Capitol in Washington, has returned to the city of Cincinnati, but we never would have obtained, to paint a grand naval picture for the Senate Wing of the Capitol, or accepting a commission to paint Leutze's "Westward the Star of Empire takes its Way," in the Representative Wing. Mr. Powell is to receive $25,000 for his work. The Passage of the Juris of the Mississippi by Farragut has in it more of the elements of a grand picture than any naval event in our country's history, but any artist who has the genius of our great civil war, among those who were and we hope still will be fellow-countrymen. The sinking of the Alabama as a subject is not open to this objection, inasmuch as the Alabama was an English built ship, armed with British guns, and manned with British sailors, and the result was a fair victory of American seamanship, skill and bravery over British. Perhaps, however, Mr. Powell will find in the fight of Paul Jones, and the celebration of the first American naval victory, a subject more appropriate for his pencil.

Summary of the War.

There is no reliable news from Gen. Sherman, the rebel papers, from which alone we have hitherto received our intelligence of his whereabouts, having received orders from their government to withhold all statistics in the premises from the Union army. The only items they contain is a correspondence between Gen. Sherman and the rebel Gen. Wade Hampton, the former is dated "In the Field, 21th of Feb," and the rebel's reply is dated 27th of February.

From a letter of Gen. Sherman's letter, which is in reference to the murdering of his foraging parties when taken prisoners by the rebels, he would not at that time have met with the slightest reverse. After stating that it has been officially reported to him that certain of his foraging parties had been murdered after capture and falsified "Death to all foragers," he says, "I have ordered a similar number of prisoners in our hands to be disposed of in like manner." He also says he has a sufficient number of rebel prisoners in his hands to retaliate for all such murders. The rebel General, in reply, denies that any orders have been given for the killing of prisoners after capture, and threatens retaliation.

A letter from Washington, dated the 6th inst., by way of Philadelphia, states, in the most positive terms, that a scout from Gen. Sherman's army had been captured by the rebels, and was making the information of the occupation of Charlotte, South Carolina, by our forces. There had been no fighting, with the exception of a few cavalry skirmishes. Our army had been resting for a few days, but the advance into North Carolina was regarded as a certainty.

A Washington paper publishes a despatch purporting to be from Gen. Thomas, from the Southwest, reporting the rout of his army in Tennessee, in information, obtained from the rebels, that Hardee, in endeavoring to effect a junction with Hardee, had had an encounter with the forces of Gen. Sherman with a few veteran brigades, and that Johnston was supposed to have attacked him in front, and defeated him. He adds, it is said, reports are not up in time, and did not give battle at all.

From Mobile we learn that 22 steamers, and six Massiesup ferry transports are in the bay there, up on the 25th of Feb., and also that a large body of troops were congregated at Pensacola, and on Tallahassee Railroad, awaiting an opportunity to cut the city.

Quiet still pervades the Army of the Potomac so far as fighting the enemy or making new movements, the roads still being in a bad condition; the necessary work of drilling and reviewing progressing to an active campaign in daily progress. In advancing the picket lines of the 1st corps it is reported that rebel colonel roger Pryor found a new picket line in their front. Great preparations are making in the Irish brigade for the celebration of St. Patrick's day. A grand melodie mastickie was given by the 69th corps opera troupe on the 8th.

TOWN COSSIP.

When a newspaper or a follow gets well over the hump and embarks prosperously on its twenty-one year or volume, a decent regard for his own opinion requires that he should set to congratulating himself. No one else can do it with a graceful air, and, as somestandinby or so beartly. It is as rash an age that the man, in the early or late morning, fails to caressing the downy chin, and bridling up his arm into a Cape Cod to test the muscle. The good opinion of others is a matter concerning, but then the man comes out with such a chinese, such a tongue!

In this behalf we have to say that we must yen for this in minutes of gossip, we word exercising in our graceful way before you came, and now know pretty fairly what we are about. Indeed, how we like to be formed a flattering opinion of our own muscle at nineteen minutes of age.

It seems only by land and sea, wherever the banner of the republic has been carried by its strong defenders, you may have heard us travelling. At spec to answer, all hand to portray, all hand to tell—we getting the truth and the lies, and the lies to get the truth, and the tale and the sad reprises would have been your conception of this immense struggle for an integral government, if you could not get it from the lips of those who have fought it. You know the aspect of the very spot where your brother got the wound of which he died, and you have seen together the palaces where the brave boys have suffered, the assaults they have made, the camping-grounds they have played under—and the graves and the hideaways where they sauhered the Johnnies. We are going to do it again. We give all accumulated adventures and incidents of every and the fairest warring, whether within, domestic, adventurous, tragical, comic or what. If you don't want to talk with us, you better cover your bodges, for "a chiel's among ye takin' notes, and faith he'll print 'em." Wherever you are going, or have been, keep behind, and travel—

All travel gets us in mind of what we were about to say, and we will now do so, when we have made a confession of self-flattery overlook us.

The perils of travel are great, although there are two ways to every question, still there are a few questions as simple as the head of a dandy who parts in the middle. Some have their sides split. No man, therefore, who buys a ticket for a railway trip pays cheerfully for the specific of a baggage—carpet-bag, portmanteau or valise—as the public in a pagoda, and exploding him into the society of Brutals—to localize the nouns—with his pretty three square report and his hair done by the conductor. The ladies of the central towns of Pennsylvania are more particularly to be kindly exercised since in the condition of as high mantle, with his scaly nose of it. It is a good thing, after shaving in a rebel jail, to be getting back to the old girl in Connecticut; but she won't want to see you so bad, nor if you have given your hand to an older girl in Bristol.

We fear we are speaking too seriously. No doubt we are. To-morrow some easiliness correspondent will remind us that this is not the column for sermons. The fact is we feel, and so we speak—we look into our heart, and write. We find there a sneaking tenderness for an accomplished and highly-educated mustache, that was never born to feel the depilating influence of hot steam. There is a foot, too, that has been commended by Mrs. Wa, who considers it her property. We should be loth, although our personal courage is so-so, to present ourself in the family room with that foot in our pocket, in an alcohol-jar.

We suppose what is wanted is to have on board every train some officer of extraordinary acumen and ability, of discretion most rare, of responsibility most weighty, of vigilance most intense, and to pay heavily for securing such a man. What passenger would demur to the extra tax after he had once conceived the sensation of reasonable security? If these cares and qualities are compatible with the ordinary duties of the conductor, let the conductor be the person—paid heavily, held fearfully responsible, and, upon the slightest negligence, dropped into such fatal and hopeless odium as a man endures who hangs his fellow-man for money. Such an oversight as the neglect to place lights at the end of a night-train should be a thing, not merely to be scolded at, but simply impossible. Upon every train some one man should ride who feels around his neck the weight of every life aboard, as heavy as a millstone—a man quite capable of estimating the vast additional importance of care on our enormous lengths of way, beyond anything yet conceived in European schemes of travel, and who should earn a handsome salary by the exercise of keeping his eyes open. It has been demonstrated lately that there are public occasions on which a man really must not be drunk and spill rambling speeches about; so our ideal conductor must understand that he is to vent his homicidal propensities on his family or near friends, and that in his public capacity as representative, or we might say Vice-President of the travelling interest, his passengers' lives have been engaged and paid for, and are not at his disposal.

But we are not grumbling with the slightest idea of being listened to. Everybody knows how it goes. Sickening disasters have taken place on every line in the country, quite up to the point of boredom, and upon each tragedy such newspapers as are not on terms of agreeable intimacy with the railroad presidents, come out next day with immense palaver and outcry. Hear Icenian, Catieuchlanian, hear Ooritanian, Trinobant! Meantime there is no harm in sending a reporter or so to the spot, and making a little capital out of the occurrence. By another morning the rolling globe has turned up something else to the light.

There is always a fine opulence of subject matter in the way of German Conferences, or the Queen of Spain, or the Encyclical, or the Davenport Brothers, or the City Drainage. Which reminds us that we are ourself one of the city scavengers, and that our proper business is with what we can pick up here in these streets of New York.

It was our intention to say a word or two about the Strong divorce case, at which all the demi-monde have been snuffing and chuckling for a long time past. It was called up again on Thursday, the 9th, in the Superior Court, with the most sensational affidavits, charges and indictments. On approaching the printed testimony, however, though we had fortified ourselves at considerable expense with a quantity of these little violet nosegays they sell up and down Broadway, we found the Strong case so exceptionally and piercingly strong, that we fled a great many inches from that newspaper, and sought to regain our previous purity in the pages of Rabelais and the Decameron.

The exquisite acting of Mrs. Lander has given place upon the stage she adorned to the figure of Mr. Bandmann. In contemplating the performance of this gentleman, we always feel as if we were watching the manufacture of a great actor going on beneath our eyes, so evident is his development in the resources of his art, and so certain an ultimate great success. Attacking a new profession in mature life under a quantity of disadvantages, his enthusiasm and native genius have borne him already to a most respectable position, and are constantly carrying him on before our faces towards the goal to which he has set his own. He has unhappily selected for his initial performance a play adapted from an inferior tale of Bulwer's. All the interest of the drama is centered in the acting of Mr. Bandmann, and we think he has shown a want of tact in making such a selection. There will be plenty of treats for his admirers, however, as the artist goes on to unfold his repertory.

The "Hamlet" of Edwin Booth is rapidly approaching its hundredth consecutive representation, without any diminution of spirit in the actor, or enthusiasm in the public. It is emphatically the great triumph of Shakespearian representation in the present century. The newly inaugurated Saturday matinées have proved a remarkable success, filling the building with such hosts as probably were never gathered there before. On Saturday night last, the fair Ophelia of the play, Mrs. Chanfrau, took her benefit in the drama of the "Colleen Bawn," Mr. Chanfrau coming on from Washington to assist.

We learn that Mr. Henry Diffenderffer, a poet and litterateur of some prominence, has retired from the desk of a great merchant in this city, to accept an honorable position in the house of Messrs. Lake & McCreery. He will be heard from again, and always acceptably, in the columns of the public press.

The opera still flourishes; the lovely cantatrices singing like Sidney's shepherd, "as if they never should be old." On the Saturday matinée (though why afternoon performances are matinées, our French is too weak to explain), we had "Ernani," with some great vocalization by Signora Carozzi-Zucchi; while on the same evening Miss Kellogg charmed the natives of Brooklyn with her exquisite and favorite "Linda."

The aching sides, for which the guilty Mr. Owens is responsible, have had a partial relief during the present week, that comedian appearing in a character less broadly farcical than those which preceded it. Instead of the "Indian," "Toodles," or the wretched hero of "Forty Winks," we have had the delightful domestic play of "Dot," with Owens full of capital humor as Caleb Plummer.

The man whom Heller is abusing so every night by creating and destroying him at pleasure, looks, we fancy, worse than he did. Something is preying on his mind. He is evidently brooding over the question, Suppose the wizard should forget some fine night to bring him to life again, and his place among the living and the visible know him no more! It is a critical position.

The funny Alfred Burnett is having grand sport at Dodworth's Hall with his representations of character. His rapid changes of visage are marvellous.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—Of the 731 prisoners at present confined in the Gratiot street prison, St. Louis, 242 have expressed a desire to take the oath of allegiance and reside north of the Ohio river during the war.

—— On the field of Gettysburg there were 27,574 guns picked up, and of these 24,000 were found to be loaded, and half of them were double loaded. One-fourth had from three to ten loads in, and many had five or six balls to one charge of powder. In some cases the powder was above the ball, in other the cartridges were not broken at the end, while in one musket 23 balls, 62 buckshot, and a quantity of powder were all mixed up together.

—— The refusal of the New Jersey Legislature to ratify the Constitutional Amendment Bill has defeated that measure for the present. The three States which refused to ratify were Kentucky, Delaware and New Jersey.

—— Col. Mulford, our agent for the exchange of prisoners, has advised persons in the North to send no more supplies or letters to relatives and friends in Southern prisons, as they will all soon be released.

—— It is proposed by a few enterprising capitalists to form a company, for the importation of jerked beef from Rio Grande, where it can be obtained in any quantities for two cents a pound.

—— On the 5th of March the wires of the Western Union Telegraph Company were connected with the Pacific line, and communication was established direct between this city and San Francisco, a distance of 4,000 miles.

—— One company in New York is seeking to obtain a charter to run a subterranean railroad in Broadway, while another is applying for one to build a railroad on a level with the second storey of Broadway.

—— There were 575 interments last year in Auburn Cemetery.

—— A correspondent informs us that there is an understanding between the gold-holders and the mercantile classes to let the price of the precious metal sink gradually, as both would be ruined should the fall be too sudden.

—— Real estate speculators are suffering heavily through the recent decline in the bullion market.

—— The number of disreputable divorce cases is becoming alarmingly large in New York.

—— The city of St. Louis has a population of 165,446 whites, of whom 76,496 are male, and 78,630 females, and 0,820 negroes of both sexes. Contrary to the general opinion, the American born population exceeds all the "foreign" and unascertained elements combined, being 88,500 out of the whole number.

—— The Boston Transcript, a sprightly newspaper of generally unexceptionable taste, is responsible for introducing a verbal barbarism, namely, "unifying!" Where's the schoolmistress—that anciently feminine ornament of New England?

—— Gov. Brown, of Georgia, describes the present situation of the rebellion very accurately: "The night is dark—the tempest howls; the ship is lashed with turbulent waves; the helmsman is steering to the whirlpool."

—— There now four medical colleges for women in operation, having been opened in Boston in 1848, in Philadelphia in 1850, in New York in 1863 and in London in 1864.

—— The Minnesota Legislature has agreed to submit the question of permitting the negroes to vote to the people at the next November election.

—— The contributions to the Edward Everett statue amounted to $31,014.

—— In the deserted office of the Charleston Courier was found the beginning of an editorial in type, thus: "There are no indications that our authorities have the first intention of abandoning Charleston, as we have ascertained from careful inquiry," and then the compositor dropped his stick and ran with the rest.

—— The edition of the New Testament in which everything is made to conform strictly to Baptist principles has at length been issued. It reads after this manner: "In those days came John the Immerser, preaching in the wilderness of Judea."

—— The Royal Astronomical Society of London has awarded its gold medal, this year, to an American, Professor George Phillips Bond, of Harvard College, Mass.

—— The Legislature of Kansas, in decreeing the establishment of a State University, has connected with it a female department, the pupils of which are to have access to the library and the lectures of the university.

—— One House of the Pennsylvania Legislature has passed a bill giving up the bed of the Alleghany river, in the oil regions, to oil speculators, who expect to find oil in great abundance by boring for it in the bed of the river. The grant is estimated to be worth millions, and it is charged that the members who voted for the bill are to share in the plunder.

Southern.—Gov. Brown, of Georgia, has issued a message, in which he severely censures Jeff Davis for neglecting Georgia, and leaving her to bear unaided the weight of Sherman's army. Despite the angry spirit it breathes against the Richmond Government, it declaims most furiously against re-entering the Union.

—— Gen. Imboden is said to be in command of all the Union prisoners in Georgia, Alabama and Mississippi.

—— The Richmond Enquirer informs us that when, a few days since, Gens. Crooke and Kelly, captured at Cumberland, were conducted to Early's headquarters, the latter addressed them thus: "Take seats, gentlemen; I presume you are tired after your ride." And then added the hero of brilliant victories and stunning defeats, with an intensification of that fine-tooth-comb peculiarity of his enunciation: "I expect some enterprising Yankee will be stealing off with me in the same way one of these days."

—— Public subscriptions of money and provisions are being raised in the South for the support of Lee's army.

Military.—Great guns cost something: a 10-inch Parrott gun costs $4,500; a 15-inch Rodman gun costs $6,500; a 15-inch Krupp's gun costs $39,400; a 12-inch Blakeley gun costs $35,000. The two latter are made of steel.

—— Ten thousand four hundred military appointments have been laid before the Senate since the commencement of the war.

—— Capt. Loper, who was declared a defaulter to a large amount two years ago, has been honorably acquitted.

—— An enterprising recruiting officer is now making arrangements to transfer a legion of 1,000 men from the Cape of Good Hope, Africa, to New York. They are Germans, and now in the service of the British Government, having been sent to that part to put down the Kaffir revolt. Their time is just out, and they have sent an officer here to arrange the terms of their enlistment.

—— Men now are easily obtaining $1,000 as recruits. Good substitutes have even obtained higher terms. It is said that Brooklyn has suffered more than any other town by the war in the shape of able-bodied men.

Personal.—Roger A. Pryor has arrived in Richmond on parole.

—— Mr. Calicott, of Brooklyn, has been appointed special agent and supervisor of the rebel States.

—— Garibaldi has declined to accept the invitation to visit England this year.

—— It is contemplated to give Edwin Booth a public entertainment when he has performed Hamlet 100 nights. On the 8th he had performed it consecutively, excepting Sundays, 89 times, a feat altogether unparalleled in the history of dramatic art.

—— The youngest volunteer in the U. S. army is Strod Putnam, aged 14. He has been wounded twice severely, and distinguished himself on both occasions.

—— Fitzhugh McCulloch, who succeeds Fessenden as Secretary of the Treasury, was born in Maine, in 1812. In his youth he moved to Indiana, where he became cashier of a bank, which he retained for 20 years. In 1855 he was made President of the New Indiana State Bank. Mr. Chase made him controller of the currency in 1861. He has thus devoted all his life to finance.

—— Gen. McClellan, on his way to Rome, passed through Liverpool, London and Paris, but attracted very little attention in either of those cities.

—— M. Blondell, the Belgian Minister at Washington, has been accredited to Mexico.

—— There is a Brig.-Gen. Terry in the rebel army, who is stationed in Texas at the present time. He was formerly Chief Justice of California, and in 1859 resigned that position in order to fight a duel with Mr. Broderick, Senator from that State, whom he killed. He left California in 1862, and went to Texas via Mexico.

Obituary.—Herr Narbut, the well-known Polish historian, died recently, aged 82.

—— Francois Roelants, one of the shining lights of Flemish dramatic literature, is dead.

—— Paul Royer Collard, the distinguished Professor of International Law, is dead; he was in his 61st year.

Accidents and Offences.—A man named Clements was arrested on the 7th of March in Washington, charged with having declared his intention of assassinating President Lincoln. He was evidently crazy.

—— A lawyer named Brizee, of Chicago, recently stabbed the keeper of a notorious house in that city, named Sayers, alias Jewellery Jack. He died a few hours afterwards.

—— On Tuesday morning a frightful accident occurred on the Camden and Amboy railroad, near Bristol, by which 13 were killed and over 40 desperately injured. It was occasioned through the carelessness of the railroad officials.

Foreign.—It is stated by the Index, the London rebel journal, that over 800 American vessels, amounting to 600,000 tonnage, have been transferred from the United States flag to the British.

—— The rebel ram built in France, and called the Olinda, has been rechristened the Stonewall. The United States steamer Niagara is in pursuit of her.

—— The Davenport Brothers seem to have run out their popularity in England. At Huddersfield they refused to be tied by the two persons appointed by the audience, and had to return the money; and in Hull they backed down altogether. The great fools are those who believed in their spiritual agency.

—— Dr. Gwin says that Sonora has been ceded to France by a secret treaty, not to be made public till the pacification of the Mexican Empire. Meanwhile the mineral resources will be under the complete control of the French, who will hold it in military occupation for industrial purposes.

—— The nobles of Moscow have resolved by 270 to 37 votes to petition the Czar for a free deliberative parliament, to consist of two chambers, one composed of nobles, and the other of popular representatives. They do not venture to ask that these bodies shall have the right of making laws, but plead that through such assemblies the truth would reach the throne.

—— Benito Juarez, President of Mexico, has issued a New Year's proclamation, dated Chihuahua, in which he urges upon all Mexicans to fight out the question with the invaders. He reiterates his hope that he will triumph in the end.

—— Mount Etna has recommenced its volcanic eruptions. They are represented as being very splendid at night. They do little damage.

—— The Emperor of the French has been requested by the President of Uruguay to mediate between them and the Brazilians.

—— The British army and navy estimates for the year 1865–6 have just been announced. The cost of the army is $71,000,000; of the navy $51,000,000. Total estimates for the military and naval establishments for the coming year, £24,740,671; or, in American currency, $123,703,355.

—— The Philharmonic Society of Bordeaux having requested Mdlle. Adelina Patti to sing at one of their concerts, the lady informed them that her terms were 10,000 francs—$2,000.

—— Meyerbeer has left a valuable musical library, which has been deposited in the Royal Library of Berlin, to be preserved there till the coming of age of his grandson, to whom Meyerbeer in his will left this rare collection, on condition of his devoting his life to the study of music.

—— The Vienna journals announce the death of Princess Radziwill in the debtor's prison of that city.

—— A national exhibition of the products of nature, industry, and art is to be held at the city of Caraccas, in Venezuela, in April next.

—— The Moniteur de l'Armée states that the grave of one of Fernando Cortez's companions in arms has been discovered in a convent situated between Yanhuitlan and Etle, in the State of Oajaca, Mexico. The following is a translation of the inscription in the Spanish language on the monument: "Here rests the body of Don Manoel Nuno, Captain of the Guards of his very high and very powerful lord the Marquis del Valle, Governor of Mexico and Commander of the King's forces in this part of the world, died the 18th of July, 1544."

—— A dinner, at which horseflesh was the staple viand, recently took place at the Grand Hotel, Paris, under the auspices of the Society for the Protection of Animals and of the Acclimatisation Society. The number of guests exceeded 130, and they partook, apparently with great relish, of horseflesh, cooked in many different manners—roasted, boiled, stewed, and with every variety of sauce.

—— The last news from Mexico is very damaging to the native party, the French Gen. Bazaine, in command of the Imperialist army, having captured Oajaca, with its entire garrison of 5,000 men, and all their munitions of war. This last blow has induced Gen. Porfirio Diaz to submit to the Empire. England has likewise acknowledged Maximilian, the British Minister having arrived.

—— The annual dinner in honor of Washington's birthday, came off at St. James's Hall, London. Mr. Morse, the American Consul, presided. Mr. Adams was present, and a few English friends to the North.

—— The public funeral of Cardinal Wiseman was the first spectacle of the kind seen in London since the death of Queen Mary, just three centuries ago.

Chit-Chat.—In 1804 Judge Pickering was degraded from his position as Judge, by the Senate of New Hampshire, for intemperance.

—— A young lady jumped from a railroad train in England lately, to avoid an assault from a fellow-passenger, and was fined 60 cents for jumping from a train while in motion.

—— M. Alex. Dumas, the younger, has married the Princess Nariskine, the original "Dame aux Perles," whom he pursued to Russia, but was met at the frontier by a ukase ordering his transportation to Siberia if he entered the empire. She being a widow now, there is no impediment to their union. He sent his father on his birthday, his love in these words: "My forty winters send every affectionate remembrance to your sixty-two springs." This was not an infelicitous way of making the contrast between the premature sedateness of the son and the evergreen juvenility of the father.

—— The most successful burlesque ever written is "Lucretia Borgia," produced by the Buckley Brothers, at Chinese Hall, New York, in 1853. Since then it has been performed in America and England over 1,600 times. It is now being performed in Boston by the Buckleys with great success.

—— A correspondent says, I recently received an invitation to attend a surprise party under the management of the NGASALNEREDRIEAENTATDAIGN CLUB. We need hardly add the above is Welsh.

—— Concerning Crele, the oldest man in the world, the Wisconsin Journal publishes additional evidence to show that his age is quite as great as represented. It says: "We have a further item of testimony to add in support of the extreme age of Mr. Crele. A few weeks since, Mr. B. W. Brisbois, of Prairie du Chien, United States Assessor in the Third District, was in our office, and happened to speak of the remarkable longevity of Crele. Mr. Brisbois belongs to one of the old French families of the Northwest, and was born in this State. He is one of the younger members of a very large family of children, and must be now in the vicinity of 60 years of age. He stated that since a child he has known Crele, and that the latter, as he has often heard mentioned in the family, carried his grandmother, then an infant, to church in his arms when she was christened. That incident occurred considerably over a hundred years ago."

—— Some person who is fond of arithmetic, has been calculating A. T. Stewart's income, and he makes it $3½ per second of time.

—— A Jersey man was lately arrested for flogging a woman, and excused the act by saying that he was near sighted, and thought it was his wife.

—— The number of physicians in the United States is 22,543; lawyers, 37,163; clergymen, 39,629. It would thus appear as though we were nearly twice as wicked as we are sickly.

—— A rector in London having cultivated with great success a moustache, was persuaded by a member of his congregation to sacrifice it, and not again indulge in such a vanity, by a donation of £60 or $300 for the benefit of the poor.

ABOUT MEXICO.

A German traveller, one Baron Müller, has recently published the second volume of his travels in Mexico. We hardly know what credit to attach to his narration. Some portions of it are very strange, not to say improbable. In the part dedicated to the clergy, whom he represents as exceedingly immoral, he introduces the name of Gen. Gadsden (at the time of his visit United States Plenipotentiary in Mexico) in evidence of the truth of his statements. He states that while in Mexico, a conspiracy of the Franciscans was detected, which Comonfort punished by ordering their monastery to be closed, under the pretext of opening a fresh street through it. At an inspection of the monastery, Gen. Gadsden, who was present, gave the following description of what he saw there:

"Immediately upon opening the monastery gates, above twenty girls and women were discovered, some of whom had disappeared years before, and had been mourned as dead by their relatives, but had been kept in concealment here by the pious brethren. Twenty to thirty orphan lads, partly from distant provinces, who had been adopted under the mask of charity and Christian love, were found to be in a horrifying state of mental and bodily corruption. A wretched man was discovered immured in a niche; he was about 60 years of age, his clothes were the most miserable rags, his hair and beard long and neglected. The wall which cut him off from the living and enclosed a cell, in which he could neither sit nor lie down, had only two openings, the one above, the other below, for feeding and cleansing purposes. The poor fellow was unable to tell how long a time he had passed in this awful captivity, but declared that he had been confined by his brothers because he had accused them of several murders. On the other hand, the monks, when examined, charged him with murder, and declared that they had punished him in this way in order to avoid public scandal and escape blood-guilt."

On the next day Baron Müller himself went to the monastery with Gen. Gadsden, and first visited the library, where the government commissioner invited him to select any books and manuscripts he liked; of which permission the conscientious German did not avail himself, though the American officers did so. On reaching the monastery chapel fresh mysteries were revealed. He says:

"The hollow sound of my footsteps on a large slab in front of the altar attracted my attention, and aroused the suspicion of a secret hiding-place. I expressed my suspicion, and we were still occupied with the visitation, when the Governor of the city, Señor Paz, arrived, and took a lively interest in the matter. Several laborers, who had already begun the work of pulling down, were by his orders summoned to bring crowbars and picks. The huge stone rose, was turned over, and a deep vault yawned before us. A steep flight of steps led down into it, but not one of the Mexicans present ventured down them; hence Gen. Gadsden and I took two candles from the altar, lit them, and descended the five-and-twenty steps. We found ourselves in a dark vault, amidst a great number of small coffins piled up against the walls. Some of them had been already opened by the tooth of time, but these, as well as all the rest, contained the bodies of babies who, as it was afterwards proved on examination, had all been born in the monastery, and died shortly after birth."

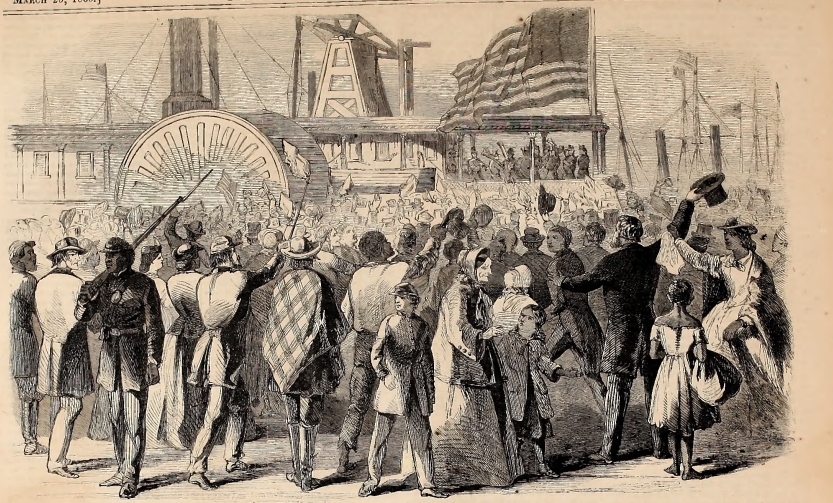
We cannot possibly believe that the trail of a crime was discovered here. If these children were the fruit of criminal intercourse, and died an unnatural death, they would certainly have been buried at some other spot, where they would have rapidly rotted, in order to hide all traces of the crime. For murderers to carefully place the bodies of murdered babes in coffins and keep them in vaults, would certainly have been a very clumsy trick. Our author, however, is just enough to remind us of what Mexico owes to her clergy:

"We must not forget," he writes, "that during the first hundred and fifty years following the conquest, the Spanish priest was the sole protector and fosterer of the arts and trades in the colonies; that even at the present day the State is indebted to his intelligence for the greater portion of its public buildings, roads and canals; and, above all, that it was the priests who, with true humanity, protected the helpless Indians against the avarice and inhuman barbarity of the conquistadors and their successors, and obtained from the crown the promulgation of merciful laws, in order to prevent the utter extirpation of these harmless, suffering aborigines."

Of the Mexican women the baron draws anything but a flattering picture: "They certainly have black, flashing and provocative eyes; but, on nearer intercourse, you find that the mind is wanting which would effectively sustain the fire. They are blessed with small, graceful hands and feet, the national inheritance from their Moorish and Spanish ancestors; but the features of the women and girls are on the average displeasing, and though among the upper classes decenter and, at times, pleasanter faces may be found, I could scarce discover a single pretty girl among the hundreds whom I saw daily on the market-places of Mexico."

The decently pretty girls, however, destroyed the favorable impression by the rebozo, the long narrow cloth which, like the veil in the East, covers nearly half of the face. But what aids far more in rendering even pretty faces and graceful outlines common-place, is the badly-combed hair, the dirt, and the ugliness of the costume. At home, the latter is always a scanty négligé, the upper part of which is concealed by the never absent rebozo; the feet are thrust into small silk slippers; the stranger misses stockings, and at times is not sorry for it. Out of doors, on the other hand, the real Mexican woman wears on her head a silk square-folded shawl, which is unbecoming in the highest degree. Only on holidays is the exquisite mantilla of black lace substituted for it; in the evenings, on the Paseo and in carriages, the French bonnet has asserted a right which is no longer contested. Only the Indian girls, and a few women belonging to the lowest white class, go about in chemise and petticoat, with their face unveiled, and the head covered with a small straw or beaver hat.

GRAND INAUGURAL PROCESSION,



6th March, 1865.

In many respects it was fortunate that the weather compelled the postponement of the grand procession from the 4th to the 6th of March, since it induced many to participate who would have held back on the former day, fearing that it might have been construed into a personal endorsement of President Lincoln's inauguration. If there is one thing that as a people we enjoy more than a 4th of July oration, it is an unforeseen holiday, and this was amply evidenced last Monday, when all New York turned out to see the grand procession. This was a table land all would meet upon, and we have never seen the streets of our great metropolis more crowded with happy and enthusiastic groups. It is computed that there were near half a million of persons on the sidewalks and thoroughfares of New York to see the procession pass, for Brooklyn, Williamsburg, Jersey City and Hoboken emptied their "treasured humanity," as Tennyson somewhat satirically terms our fellow-creatures. We shall not attempt to describe a procession which extended some seven miles, and comprised not only every class of society, but almost everybody belonging to it. There were military, firemen, model monitors—in a word, all that constitutes a State, marching along. But we refer our readers from our pen to the pencils of our Artists, whom we detailed to make sketches of a few principal incidents of the spectacle.

In this, as on former occasions, we could not help observing what a "law abiding" community the great city of New York is; with a very few exceptions, and those trifling ones, everything passed off with the utmost order. The line of march was from 14th street down Broadway to Astor House, thence up Park row, Centre street, Bowery, 4th Avenue to 23d street, and then to Union Square, where it broke up. The weather was magnificent, and all political differences were buried on this occasion. The air seemed positively flavored with flags, while the occasional booming of cannon and the continual strains of music gave an exhilaration to the scene, which, like that of champagne, may be felt but not described.

VIEW OF RICHMOND, VA., FROM THE PRISON-CAMP AT BELLE ISLE, JAMES RIVER.

ENTHUSIASTIC CROWD OF CITIZENS OF CHARLESTON, S. C., ASSEMBLED ON VANDERHORST'S WHARF, FEB. 20, TO OBSEE THE SECOND VISIT OF GEN. GILLMORE AND STAFF.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

THE GRAVE BY THE STREAM.

BY JOEL DAVES SWETT.

Down by the margin of our own loved stream,
Where, in the twilight hours, we used to roam,
And arm in arm, together, talk and dream
Of future days, and build our fancied home,

Beneath the hanging branches of a willow,
Can now be seen a little grass-grown mound,
Under whose sod her dear head found a pillow—
A resting place, low in the chilly ground

There, where the rippling waters murmur by,
Was laid my Winnie, long, long years ago;
We thought the place was fit for her to lie,
Where she so loved to hear the waters flow;
And then, we thought, perhaps, at times, her spirit
Would hover near, around this cherished spot;
And had her there, that she might ever hear it,
The singing stream, that flowed so near our cot

On noiseless wheels the chariot of Time
Has rolled along, and I an aged now;
Long pilgrim years, in many a foreign clime,
Have carved their wrinkles deep upon my brow;
Since Winnie died, I've been a cast-a-way—
Earth has, to me, been desolate and drear;
And now I've come, to spend my fading day,
And rest, at last, along with Winnie, here

Oh, what sweet forms ring through the mists of years!
What happy dreams I'm dreaming o'er and o'er!
What seraph tones salute my listening ears,
As I now stand upon the streamlet's shore!
'Tis but the silver music of the water,
Reviving all the memories of yore;
Oh, let my footsteps, until death come, totter
Where I, with Winnie, used to roam before

NUMBER TEN.

BY EDWARD SPENCER.

"NUMBER TEN!"

The letters stared up at me from the pavement, where they were printed upon the footworn bricks in broad chalk marks. The numerous passers trod upon or over them, as they went along to their business. I, only a sauntercr, and pacing the street head downwards, in one of my abstracted moods, felt myself arrested by them, as it were. There was a magnetic something about them, or rather a magnetic sympathy about me, growing out of my mood, which enabled me to discover in these chalk-marks upon the busy highway, not simply written words—a dealer's sign, or his number, as doubtless most persons took them to be, who noticed them at all—but a symbolism. So I raised my head, and looked about me for the writer.

He was there, I perceived immediately. Sitting upon an empty goods box, with the rounded piece of chalk in his hand—his eyes bent upon the inscription with intent and eager watchfulness. A little man, one shoulder higher than the other and a sort of wryness generally perceptible about his whole figure. He was dressed in a patched fustian jacket, a soiled coarse muslin shirt, and trousers of faded and sunburnt blue check. A ragged, bootless straw hat decorated his head, and upon his stockingless feet were a pair of coarse, dusty shoes, tied with leather strings. He had a stick in the other hand, and, upon the box by his side, was a small bundle enclosed in a striped handkerchief in the memorial way to which all "tramps" are accustomed.

"I am I an uncommercial traveller, I perceive,' was my reflection, as I paused for a moment, and scanned him from head to foot. And I was about to pass on, when, probably attracted by my pause, the man looked up and met my eyes with his own. It was a very striking face—wrinkles and tan, and a stubble of grey beard enabled me to discover that he was scarcely less than fifty years old, yet the teeth were white as milk, and the mouth mobile with the elasticity of youth. It was a small face, set round as to its upper portion with a frame of gray hair, out of which gleamed a pair of the keenest, wildest, cunningest black eyes that ever shone in a madman's head. While we looked at each other, the keen, shrewd, magpie look seemed to melt away instantaneously and give place to an expression of withering agony that made the eyes wane, and twisted the sly thin lips into a writhing attitude that was horrible to behold. Hastily, tremulously, with fierce eagerness, the man turned half around, and wrote, upon the box beside his bundle the now mystic symbols:

"Number Ten!"

When his face met mine again the agony was all fled, the look of sly wild cunning had all returned. I put my hand into my pocket, involuntarily, and handed out—not a coin, but a postage-note. With a quaint sort of satirical humour tending with the cunning of his look, the man bowed to decline my tender, and, as if in explanation, held out his own hand—it was full of double eagles! I muttered a confused apology, and passed on hurriedly, the sly wild wrinkle of his eyes following me, and the mobile lip opening to give utterance to a sort of chuckle that by no means tended to restore my equanimity.

"WHAT DO YOU KNOW ABOUT THAT."

"I should like to know what he meanshy 'Number Ten,'" said I to myself, as I passed on down the street, and I set myself to the morning through. "The man is evidently more or less lunatic, but I am much mistaken in my judgment of human nature if he is not a history to suit Mr. Wilkie Collins's those inscribed chalk-mantles."

In a brief while, however, the chalk-mania and their strange writer had passed out of my mind. Events must have all our attention in this terribly active present; and as the man of moods is passed by in the crowded bow-shops, so also is the man of moods is himself passing away from amongst us, under the pressure of a superior actuality. The tantrums of time deprive any our fine fancies—as the street noise spoils the fedding of Rogetha's "distracted musician." I should never have given another thought to this strange rencontre, which, in quieter times, might have excreased my imagination for weeks, had not the actor in it been forced again upon my attention, probably less than a fortnight after I first saw him.

The first meeting was in the crowded, and upon the crowded street. The second was where no passers by were to be expected. I had started for a walk in the park, and was taking a way thereto, unfrequented by streets, partly not to be jostled, partly to escape the dust of a thirsty spell of weather, I had come to the part of the suburbs not more than half built up, and where the inchoate city defines itself in new streets, the vacant lots bordering upon which have not yet run in with temporary fences. These inclosures, the definition of property rights not yet made profitable by being put into the condition of property, are new and then described the limits of forlorn cow-pastures, but more oftener merely concealed rubbish heaps. They were a medium for the display advertisements—not hills of theatres, lectures, public meetings, and the like, but cheap goods, patent coffees, medicines, lotions, and the like, etc. In the midst of a large collection of this kind, partly handbills, partly painted on, behold in fresh chalk-marks, large, white, and conspicuously staring—

"Number Ten!"

The inscription struck me like a flash, and immediately I looked to the right and left, expecting to find its author. But he was not visible, though half fancied I could hear his chuckle and see again the magic of his long neck, the sharp, wild, cunning eye, so vivid an impression of him had been printed upon my memory. While I still stood there, a carter, a public hack, came up the street, and I turned my head to look, for vehicles were comparatively rare in that neighborhood, except when the dust-carts were going or brewers' slops. There were two persons in it—a man in undress uniform, with a crape hat-band on him to indicate he was the late staff, and a woman, a fair-haired, glorious-looking creature, of thirty well preserved years. She was weeping bitterly, but not exactly mourning, and her rich abundance of golden hair, her full pink cheeks, dimpled and healthy, her rich dress, her jewelry in abundance, showed her splendid teeth, her merry blue eyes and plump little hands, combined to make me think her much a widow as I have ever seen on the scene. The two, as they came along, were talking and laughing very joyously, and seemed upon intimate and familiar terms. I suppose my position there upon the unpeopled street, and the way in which I gazed, attracted her attention. At any rate she looked at me very closely and attentively as the carriage passed. Suddenly, as if struck by some swift illness, her cheeks grew ghastly pale, her lips turned and turned purple, and her eyes dilated with the most painful expression of fright; she half checked an exclamation as if she were going to say, and, with her gloved hand extended towards the fence, cried:

"Oh, Christy! there there again!"

The carriage was gone before she pointed, showed palpable disturbance, if not alarm; but check grew somewhat pallid, and I saw him move his hand from his breast, as if in search of a weapon. However, anger seemed stronger than fear; there was a brief colloquy, she gesturing as if trying to calm him, and then something, then the hack stopped, being some fifty yards or so ahead of where I was—the man got out and came hurriedly towards me. Mrs. Leyford was pale of face. It was a handsome face, and a young man, evidently cultivated and intelligent, but he did not impress me as brave. There was anger in his thought, of dissipation there, of haughty pride, and of a selfishness that did not care how it prepared gratification.

"Sir," said he, roughly, 'how dare you insult" here he paused, as if struck by my unassuming look, at being about to accuse—"I mean—what do you know about that?" and he pointed to the words: "Number Ten!" Then he said I had just seen her.

"Eh!" I observed, having nothing further to say, so bewildered was I. "Number Ten?' really, sir, this is very singular behavior on your part. May I request you to favor me with an explanation? Who are you, anyhow?"

For I had not the slightest fear, being possessed with a natural dislike of being bullied.

He looked at me hesitatingly.

"I dare say you wonder you are in the conspiracy or not," said he, I thought very irrelevantly, "and I don't care; but I warn you. I am not a man to be trifled with."

"See, here, my friend," I began angrily, "I want you to know that I am not to be trifled with. Explain what this impertinence—"

Here a startling scream broke from the lady in the carriage, and I saw the author of "Number Ten," the female figure in chalk, jump to the pavement from the fence opposite the carriage, go towards it, toss a white something like a note into the lady's lap, and then, running off with surprising swiftness, disappear out of sight among some houses. The man who had accosted me pursued him a short distance, but soon gave up the chase and returned to the lady, who was sobbing and wringing her hands and crying in an hysterical way, while the driver, who had dismounted from his box, looked on in amazement equal to my own. A few words from her friend seemed to quiet the lady, and then he beckoned to me.

"You see, sir," said he, curtly, "I have reason to be annoyed. What do you know about that fellow?"

I told him briefly.

"And that is all?"

"All."

"I am sorry to have spoken rudely, but he is a poor crazy creature, dangerous perhaps, and his conduct annoys my wife. Come, Mrs. Calpher, he is gone, don't be alarmed any more. Sorry, sir, to—very you an apology, sir, for my haste. Pray pardon me."

He handed me a card, got into the carriage, bowed, and drove off, leaving his card in my hands:

"DR. CHAS. CALPHER, U. S. V."

This little event gave "Number Ten"—as, in my mind, I had come to call the maniac—a new sort of interest to me. He was now no longer an outcast, homeless an I friendless, in my thoughts. People have him, and consequently some kind and a deep mystery of some sort or other seemed to unite his destiny with the fortunes of others. He was often in my thoughts, but I did not pretend to solve the secret of his connection with the beautiful fair-haired woman whom the sight of him had so evidently terrified, or to guess whether he were the persecutor or the victim in the premises. However, as I have said, I thought of him often, and the next encounter was with him subsequent to those I have narrated served to keep my recollections of him vivid, by impressing me with a sort of fear fancy that, somehow, I was connected with him, and would not be permitted to lose sight of him until I had learned the circumstances of his life.

The first of these rencontres was in the environs of one of the camps which ringlet the city. "Number Ten" appeared to be a sort of hawking vending war-maps and cheap prints to the soldiers, and attracting great notice by his extravagant gaiety and frisky spirits. When I passed he thrust his tongue into his left cheek, and leered at me with those wicked, cunning eyes—I think the look of recognition was mutual—and the pieces of chalk was taken out of his pocket; the mystic numbers hurriedly written, and he went on with the disposal of his wares as if nothing had happened.

The next time I had gone to visit some one in the military prison, and I suppose that it was the chalk-mark, "Number Ten" ephered upon a door, the real number of which was seven. I recognized many faces, and was greeted with many a sympathy and sullenness of his comrades. This time I was of services to him, being enabled, by my official connection with the prison, to assure, in supposed condition, to procure his release, the only charge against him being that he was a mysterious character, found loitering around the camps.

After this I did not see "Number Ten" any more, and his name was not among those in the prison room wherein we are wont to stow away our memories when no longer of use, when the papers relating to them are filed away, and consigned to "mysterious murder" of Surgeon Charles Calpher, while acting as executive officer of a general hospital in the West. The details which I can't were not very copious, I remember; but while mentioning the fact that no clue to the murderer could be obtained, I suppose I should have grief and despair of the lovely woman who was his "companion" at the time, and obliterate from the reader's mind the entitled to be called Mrs. Calpher. What I know, what I had seen, and what I had darkly suspected, I kept to myself. The case was a conspicuous one morally certain that "Number Ten" was connected with this affair; but, while I was awake and eager for whatever future developments might transpire, I knew really so little about the matter that I determined resolutely to keep my own counsel, and to wait and see how I could do any good; I might do harm; and, so I have before said, I greatly doubted as to whether "Number Ten" was not himself the victim. I could not be unmindful of that fleeting look of agony.

It was partly a month after this that, as I was one gray forenoon sitting at my desk, a newspaper containing a long list of "killed, wounded and missing" before me, and my thoughts gone astray into the shadowy twilight of moody reflection, a card was handed to me, and on it I read the name of Colonel Leyford, a gentleman, a lawyer, and a relative since the earlier period of the war. He came in, a handsome, soldierly figure, with a somewhat pensive face, but care-worn, serious and deep-lined with the furrows of a life touched not lightly with the troubles of the time. Poor soul! His children and kindred lie thickly buried in the bloody tracks of our armies, and they have not been without a share in a distinguished but face to face, in civil strife and fratricidal controversy.

The usual compliments passed, Mr.

"Sir,"

"Did you know James Leyford?"

James Leyford! no; I had never met such a person.

"Possibly you may have known him by that name, and indeed I am not aware that he ever bore it in this community of late. I refer to a person whom, under the name of Jack Ford, you were last spring in command in getting released from the military prison here. Do you remember him?"

I started.

"You remember—" and I gave him a hurried description of "Number Ten," dwelling upon the personal traits of him most likely to prove his identity.

"Yes; that is the man. You have undoubtedly seen poor James as his misfortunes finally made him."

"What of him, Mr. ? I have been strangely interested in that man. I have often thought of him. Can you tell—what has become of him?"

"He is dead," said Mr. —.

"Dead!" I echoed.

"Dead. And by his own act. Committed suicide by drowning, here in my own harbor, the night after he left this city. He burn! to-morrow, and I have come, sir, in obedience to his solemn commission, to ask your presence at his obsequies."

"His commission?"

"Yes. I have been long intimate with him; I was his friend in happier days, before the curse of war scorched me and burned him to cinders; latterly I have had the management of his small affairs, and, owing to the fact that he was without His will, a scarcely formal one, but adequate to guide me, who had sole control of his affairs, after making abundant provision for one who did not deserve it, gives a legacy to me, his friend, and to you, to whom he was indebted for his liberty. Sir, I am not a man of sentiment of the maudlin purpose of his unhappy life."

With this preamble, Mr. — began the recital of a sad, sad, pitiful and saddest tales it has ever been my fortune to hear—the passions of it as heroic and will as a hurricane at midnight, and the whole train of Attila, the scorpion "scourge of God."

Leyford behaved with a certain grave dignity that was sometimes lacking in the bold and easy outery, nor grovel, nor rave. Recognising the fact that these deserved places could no longer be held sacred, he removed his property from more at large sacrifices, and keeping whatever farcvells he might make to himself, departed thence for the West. What he did within the limit his purposes were, can never be exactly known, since he did not reveal them to anybody. However, certain circumstances indicate that he meant to detect that, while seemingly inconsistent in his actions, two leading principles yet guided his conduct—revenge and love. Calpher he pursued, as cruelly, and revenge upon the war for furnishing the opportunity for that wrong. His first step, however, was to seek out Ida. He was in the retreat, to state to him briefly and curtly the circumstances in which he was, and to charge him with the management of the latter.

"The only emotion he showed," said Mr. —, "was that of joy when he found that I was using my money securely. 'For,' said he, turning his head away with a sort of strangling at his throat, 'she was innocent of her husband's crimes.' And then, through all, I fancied I could see that, in spite of his wrongs, he had lost none of his love for her, and was willing to hold to it a sinful feeling of pity, as for a cherished child gone astray."

The next thing that Mr. — heard of him was that he had made a murderous assault upon Calpher at Cincinnati, but had been foiled. His infuriated, baffled passion brought on a brain fever, and when he recovered from it—as Mr. — ascertained afterwards—he found himself imprisoned in a private madhouse, and supported at the expense of Dr. Calpher, who had managed him too deeply to venture to punish him in other ways, yet was in too great peril of his life to dare release him at large. Then he knew that vile transgressor is hard." The crime against a man's happiness had compelled the surgeon to commit crime against crime against crime, which, Parchment calls "the crime against a man's soul." Few men, in whatever heat of passion they might be, would dare to do evil deeds that long check them, not in their own narrow light, but in the broad circling aspect of their consequences. This, Leyford knew, Calpher had not done. Ida still was his own, and he must suffer accordingly.

His misery, his intense misanthropic brooding fever, his sense of injustice at his confinement, and the sights and sounds he there encountered, had the undoubted result of completely unbalancing Leyford's mind. Without being entirely insane, he had reached a condition such that no court of law would hold him responsible for his actions. His appearance was such as I have represented him when first met, and his manner had all the weird eccentricity of madness. But his monomania was not mad. His purposes were as intensively kept, and his conduct as much to those purposes as could possibly be. Of course the sane entirely recovered from illness, than he planned and achieved his escape from the asylum with such adroit and far-reaching cunning that his cracks were completely covered, and no clue could be obtained by the surgeon to his whereabouts.

He now began to embrace a set of operations such as could only be achieved in a disordered period of civil war, and such, too, as could only be undertaken by a man in the control of much of a half lunatic. As I have said, he sought to be revenged as well upon the war as upon his wife's betrayer; and, to be revenged upon the war, he took vengeance upon those who were engaged in its conduct. His hatred was impartial and indiscriminate; he served both parties, betrayed both, and did all the injury in his power to each. He was alternately a Federal scout and a Confederate spy; such side-ranged that his extravagant insolence was assumed to dupe the other, each was to sure duped by him. From Richmond to Washington, from Nashville to Chattanooga, from Memphis to Vicksburg, he was an incessant go-between. No secrets of movement or plan could be concealed from him, and he betrayed everybody, disclosed everything, from a pure impulse of insensate mischief. He would lead one party into ambuscade, would then ambush them in turn, and all so cunningly that suspicion never clung to him. His sole concern was to do harm, and he was the untiring machinator of evil to both hell-fiercents.

All this while he was watching Caliper and his wife, and waiting for the opportunity to wipe out his wrong in the person of its author. It was in this quest that I first encountered him, and the meeting in the suburbs had given him the opportunity, oft repeated, of keeping alive in Caliper's mind an uneasy consciousness that he was constantly watched and constantly in danger of his life.

In procuring Leyford's release from the military prison I probably became degree contributed to hasten the catastrophe, but I deem that this step was short of the death which must have finally overtaken it. We — told me that Caliper was aware of his danger, and had been repeatedly warned of it by himself. Leyford made no secret of his intentions, but his cunning was so alert and his disguises so numerous that to arrest him or to keep mind disappointments was simply impossible. At one moment, as a Government secret agent, so he boila could stand against him; at another, as a rebel spy, he had access to every hiding-place on the underground route from Kentucky to Canada. Now he would concert with Mosby and Moseby, now he would send or drive teams for McClellan or Grant. He was in the pay of every body who had secret purposes to achieve, and by means of these disguises and concealments; Government detectives obeyed his orders, and Copperhead leagues received him with open arms.

So, finally, after I had had him released, he had sought out Caliper, and, with devilish spite and shocking cold malignity, had assassinated him. Though Mrs. Leyford had not seen him, and could only guess that he was the author of the crime, he had been witness of her grief and agony and despair at Caliper's death, and this seemed to have given him the coup de grace. She loved her still, and it is probable his mad brain had entertained the thought that, now Caliper was removed, she could be won back to him. To have seen her weep, and shriek, and mourn over the dead body of her lover, had revenged both her and himself in a way that he knew well enough she never could have grieved for him, utterly crushed him. All from the sight, and, heart-broken, shrunk, dying, made his weary way to Mr. —— preparatory to the final act of his bitter tragedy.

"When he came to my place four days ago," continued Mr. ——, "I was shocked beyond my capion at the change wrought in him. I had heard and read of the murder, I had felt that he was guilty of it, I had determined, ere he came to me again, to have him brought to account for it. But, when he did come, the only emotion I felt, the only emotion I really could feel was pity for him, was pity for the wreck—was, haggard, shivering: the bright, unearthly light had all gone out of his eyes, and his brain was hardened. He seemed half-starved, his hands shook, his blue lips quivered, and a rattling cough broke at every second sentence that he uttered. It was his horrible incessance. The former wild, fierce, maniacal energy of his manner I need to think was produced by drugs, but it was still so torturing to witness as his present apathy, dejection and wretchedness.

"I have killed him, Mr.——,' was the first word he spoke, 'but it has done no good. She loved him better than she loved me, and I have robbed the only friend I worshipped of all earthly bliss. Oblivion, or wretched comfort she had. Woe is me! My race is run?"

"And he rocked himself back and forth in a dreary sort of way, feebly moaning, and racked continually by his cough. I began to speak encouragingly to him, to assure him it might be unsufferer, no matter how culpable, but he cut me short:

"'No, no!' said he. 'It is not the blood upon my hands that troubles me, but—do you not see? —I have crushed her. What does talking matter, my love? I have been kind to you, Mr.——, and consolo you. I have my course laid out, my mind made up. I wish to leave my final instructions with you, ere I depart out of this cursed land for ever.'

"He then placed a package of papers in my hand, containing many other things, he said, and

"'The bequest to you is duly conveyed, also that to Mr. ——.'

"And he briefly explained what you knew of him, and how you had served him. He then went on, coughing incessantly.

"'Mr. ——,' said he, 'I leave my unhappy wife in your charge, for I shall never see her again, and she would not see me willingly, even if I were to desire it. As for myself, my course is run, and I will not be any danger of our meeting again. You will give me a chance to escape into foreign parts, will you not? A long sea voyage, and then, if you like, you can raise what hue-and-cry you please against me as a murderer.'

"I had assured him he might put my mind how to act, for the man did not look as if he could live four days, so I held my peace.

"Only four days. After that time you must promise me to go on to see her—she is at Chicago —and to make the provisions I have set forth in her behalf. You will, will you not? For the last great distress of mind, Mr. ——, and I think you can talk to her so as to do her good. You will go, won't you?

"I promised him I would go.

"'Thank you! Thank you!' said he, seizing my hand with a convulsive eagerness. 'I have been very kind to me—very kind. In four days, Mr. ——.'

"Here he was taken with another and violent spasm of coughing that left him deadly pale.

"'There is one thing more, Mr. ——,' said he, speaking with difficulty and pain. 'After I had done the deed and stood by to witness her agony for the dead man, I gathered, from her disjointed cries, that she had indeed loved him more than she had ever loved us. She was about to become a mother. Will you tell her,' said he, and his broken voice became almost sweet in its calmness, 'will you tell her, as a proof of my forgiveness, if she needs it, and as a proof that her life with me was not totally unhappy, if the child should be a boy, she conjoin my name with his in naming it—will you tell her to call it Charles James? And, if a girl, that Uncle Hermes will smile at beholding us there reconciled through that child?'

"He ceased, as it was the most touching thing I ever beheld, that wretched man's face at that moment. What could I say of reproof to him? What could I do but wipe away my tears?

"Again he was silent, and rocked himself sadly to and fro, while I promised to do the best I could to carry out his wishes. Then, at last, he rose to speak to him, to refer to his future, and to breathe the word Hope, he turned his ghastly face up to me, his arms, and fell, heavily, dead.

"Stay!—for God's sake, stay! My cup is dregged with agathy. I am narcotized with these drugs—I dare to rouse not my energy. Oh, my lost happiness! my lost happiness! he shrieked out, with the voice of one drowning, and fell upon the floor insensible.

"I ran out, seeking brandy or some restorative, but when I returned he was gone!

"When they removed his body from the harbor there was nothing to identify him by except one of my cards, which was found in his pocket. After my return to Chicago I had written to Mrs. Leyford, and decently confined. He is to be buried to-morrow. Will you assist at the funeral? Will you write to her and console her as one corpse?"

As I walked along with Mr. ——, ruminating upon James Leyford's sad history, I noted with what appropriateness was the meaning of the chalk-marks, "Number Ten."

That was the number of his room at the asylum, as he was so denominated in the proprietor's correspondence with Caliper, and the lunatic had used it continually as a memorandum of his wrongs. Afterward, still, in obedience to the morbid condition of his mind, it had become a sort of mystic symbol to him, and a means to the revenge he contemplated.

Mr. —— did not approve the fancy which then seized me, but I carried out the conception, and Leyford's legacy has assumed the form of a neat and classic monument of white marble, in one of our cemeteries, bearing the inscription, with a deep-cypress tree, and hears the simple inscription—

"NUMBER TEN."

THE DARLING.

GONE from the beautiful eyes the light;
Grandsumms's darling is dying to-night:

Faintly and sweetly yielding his breath;
Plague-stricken child, for whose life we pray.

Hushed the by's melody—heart-throbbings still Around Father, we bow to Thy will.

Hide up the toy things—they shoes put away;
Lambs from Christ's bosom go never astray.

White robes enfold him—they lay him away;
Hearts are nigh breaking; help, Father, we pray.

Help of the helpless! grant Thy Spirit that we Forbid not our darling to come unto Thee.

SHAKESPEARE'S CLOVES.

THE brisk demand for Shakespearean relics which caused such a run at the time of Garrick's Jubilee at Stratford naturally led to a very lively supply of such articles. Faith was put in very scanty doses, and the Bard's autograph alone were amazing indeed. It must have been as hard for some of the curiosity-mongers of that day as for those of the present to refrain from laughing in each other's faces. Mr. Garrick, as the following letter will show, was not above being imposed upon. A pair of gloves, which he was asked to believe had "often covered the hands" of the Immortal Bard:

"LEOMINSTER, May 31st, 1769.

"DEAR SIR—On reading the newspapers I find you are preparing a grand jubilee, to be kept at Stratford-upon-Avon, to the memory of the immortal Shakespeare. I have sent you a pair of gloves which often covered the hands; they were made me a present by a descendant of the family when myself and company were over there on a visit to the Lucys. I beg you'll accept them to play of "Othello" as a benefit for repairing his monument in the great church, which we did great damage to the roof in the receipts being expended on that alone.

"The person who gave them to me, William, Shakespeare by name, assured me his father had often declared to him they were the identical gloves of our great poet, and when he delivered them to me he said, 'Sir, these are the only property that remains of our famous relation, my father possessed and sold the estate he left his family to, and these are all I have to show that I can make you for this night's performance.'

"The donor was a glazier by trade, very old, and to the best of my memory, lived in the street leading from the Town-hall down to the river. On my coming to play in Stratford, about three years after he was dead, the father of him and of our poet were brothers' children.

"The veneration I bear to the memory of our great author and player makes me wish to have these relics preserved to his immortal memory, and I am led to think I cannot dispose them for that purpose in the hands of any person so proper as our modern Roscius.

"I am, Sir,

"Your most obedient, humble servant,

"JOHN WARD."

"P. S.—I shall be glad to hear you receive them safe by a line directed for me in the Bargate, Leominster, Herefordshire."

The answer made by the Roscius to this extraordinary epistle is not upon record. Mr. Ward was of course an impostor, or had himself been imposed upon. His whole story is, no doubt, an entire delusion. He must not be confounded with a much earlier John Ward, who figures in connection with Shakespearean matters as the Vicar of Stratford-upon-Avon, appointed in 1662. An extract diary, extending from 1648 to 1679, contains some brief mention of Shakespeare's later years.

Yet the writer of the letter has a claim to the reader's interest. John Ward had been a performer in the time of Garrick, and was, in 1749, the original Hazeroth, in the tragedy of "Mariamne," by Elijah Fenton, the friend of Pope. It was the benefit that Mrs. Wellington, at Dublin, in 1760, played Sir Harry Wildair for the first time. And he was the maternal grandfather of Mrs. Siddons, the daughter having married Dr. Roger Kemble, and the great Kembles being the issue of that union.

CHARLESTON, S. C.

IT is seldom permitted to the contemporary historian to record the events of a series of pictures at once so attractive and interesting as our Artists enable us to do in the present number. In another part of our paper we give accurate sketches of Sumter, the great defence of that grand city, the head and front of the offending. This one sketches or more denotes its past military, and depict the desolation and misery that unreasoning rebellion ever brings.

The illustration on page 1, showing the Kitchen in Wentworth street, brings home war to our friends in a very vivid manner. The colored descriptions of a score of battles. It requires little exercise of fancy to imagine the negro and woman visitors reading the paper we give accurate sketches of Sumter, the great defence of that grand city, the head and front of the offending. This one sketches or more denotes its past military, and depict the desolation and misery that unreasoning rebellion ever brings.

This one sketches or more denotes its past military, and depict the desolation and misery that unreasoning rebellion ever brings.

All who have read the Charleston papers of the former time must have remarked the editorial tenacity with which the Charleston mind doubted their ability to keep the "accursed Yankees" out of their city. Even Northern papers of any pretension were known in the habit of discussing upon the impregnability of Charleston, and from the sea it was understood every strong point of defence was known by heart. How little they dreamed that the silent march of an enemy, so mine away, would be found to be a formidable foe to the humble friend of to her compliance. The Charleston correspondent of a Philadelphia paper says:

"The Captain and I got picked up on the pier an old negro, in his day a harbor pilot, but taken into disuse since the war. He was a long-time old fellow, who knew best for suggest, and other words a trifle inexact, but his talk good sense, and I found myself in the midst of a most certain quantity and quality. He tells how Charleston valuing especially upon the strength of her forts on the approaches, and that he enough to build a hundred three-decked vessels, and how they were wrought night and day in the channel, and swept away by the ebb tide; and how Charleston felt secure. But it that the Yankees had chain strong enough to resist the tide, and fastened one end around Sumter, the other to Moultrie, and through the island, that the island and the fort would be dragged up the harbor, and that they did it. The old man, with a smile that swallowed up our stone fleet and ship, holding for us, an unconscious expression of humor, and he could not know where the torpedo was that sunk the Patapsco was planned, or how the Yankees had found out that the Ironsides running, of which there has been more as Charleston, and the country is several times actually be paid a tribute to the Yankees (we Yankees, I suppose I may say) for the privilege of sending a fleet into Charleston harbor where, before the war, a Yankee vessel could not get permission.

Mr. Carl Abetz's sketches embrace views of Vendue Range, a Gentleman's residence, Meeting hotel, two street scenes—Meeting street and East Bay street—and citizens on the chief welcoming Gen. Gillmore. As faithful historians we have chosen these subjects, as next to the battle contents from the latter sketch that the Charlestonians are repugnant to us. We have assembled we compose principally of colored persons, citizens of Northern birth, and what the "gallant and gure-booded Yankees" will do with Charleston, Ere She Sank, will be usual voice of all exclusiveness, run off whenever they were pressed by necessity. The Meeting street scene is reminding our Northern Shoddyism, which makes money while our soldiers fight.

Our full page sketch from our sketches what Charleston is; what it was let us quote from Harper's Gazetteer, published a few years ago:

"Charleston contains over 30 churches, a fine theatre, several fine-class hotels—one of which, City Hotel, contains over a pair of gloves, which he was asked to believe had "often covered the hands" of the Immortal Bard: gine manufactures, a large number of great mills. 5 shipyards and an extensive trade. The harbor is large and is made with their cargoes can be drawn up in this harbor. There are also 9 banks, with an aggregate capital of $4,000,000, and numerous insurance and other companies." It had 4 daily and 3 weekly papers, numerous literary institutions, and in 1860 contained nearly 16,000 inhabitants. What a pain it must be to contemplate the present condition!

Our Special A-tist, Mr. Crane, says of Haines street: This street is one of the most beautiful business streets in the city. It stands a cotton press. In the centre is a handsome park, while monuments were never designed or remain there. Of course, as we have said, we did not have been more opportunely placed. Beside this yard you find the Meeting street building designed by Gothic Gen. Gillmore in the rear looms up one of those quaint southern old Dutch looking houses which abound so plentifully in that portion of the city. The wall to the reverse left is the monument of an attempt to rebuild, but the project was abandoned on account of the work men not being shell proof.

East Bay Street.

My sketch is taken looking about south—at any pair towards the Custom-House and Post-Office. This street as well as South Bay, front the river, and has suffered more by our fire perhaps than any other part of the city. The appearance ballad description; scarcely a house remains intact; in some instances a dozen or more have been shattered by a single shell, and invariably shattered in almost every window, roofs are crushed and walls leaning, and at one spot as you go along either and unhabitually gaze upon them; grass is growing in the streets; fires have raged here and there; crows scream around the ruins; broken bricks, timbers and debris of all kinds are heaped around. For a more perfect realization allow me to conclude this series by calling your attention to Vendue Range.

Near the old Custom-House, and leading out of East Bay street towards the Cooper river, is this once famous mart; look at it now, and we see the blight of the touch of secession's fingers.

FORT SUMTER, S. C.

FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER for May 14, 1864, was the first to give sketches of the inauguration of the present unhappy war. The Artist we had despatched on the breaking out of the rebellion, had special opportunities for this, view Gen. Beauregard impressed him into the rebel service, where he was kept under close surveillance for nine months. This, of course, enabled us that, to give the public exclusive information, both from pen and pencil—a circumstance never before allowed reporters we have always maintained. We now present our readers with two views of the interior and exterior of Sumter. Fort Sumter, and, however diminished a magnanimous victory may be to every true such a local presentation of an event, it is right one to feel a certain satisfaction when the plans of the wicked are foiled, and truth reigns in place of error. Such is a certain class, which had an unnatural pleasure in sympathizing with wrong, just as unnatural delight in delight in eating a stinkpencil, and other strange things.

The fall of Fort Sumter is one of the most emphatic lessons of the war. Our Artist was present at, and two there—have sent us numerous sketches of its present condition. We make room for two—an interior and exterior view.

The fort bears little resemblance to its appearance on the memorable night when Major Anderson and his gallant band evacuated Fort Moultrie to occupy Fort Sumter. No portion of the original wall is to be seen, except on the side towards Charleston, and a small portion of that facing Moultrie. From the bastion, and facing the harbor it is a mere mass of shapeless ruin. All the casemate, arches, pillars, and parapets, are entirely demolished, and a heap of rubbish. It is impossible to stand amid the terrible desolation of this once impregnable fortress, and not pay a silent tribute to the memory of Anderson and his men, who, for so long a time have endured our shot and shell—while we knew that they were suffering as much as could be to be proud that they were Americans. The great guns which two years ago kept the monsters at bay and answered shot for shot, are dismounted, and beneath a mountain of brick dust, concrete and mortar.

Fort Moultrie, which in April, 1861, sent a number of palmetto logs were piled on the harbor side, and against part of the wall racing Moultrie. The number of dismounted guns, piled up with logs, bars, bales Gen. Gillmore obtained possession of Fort Wagner, or portable iron shields, is very large. To describe its plense, that it was impossible to keep a gun in position on that side.

A correspondent of the Boston Journal, who was present when our Artists made some of their sketches says:

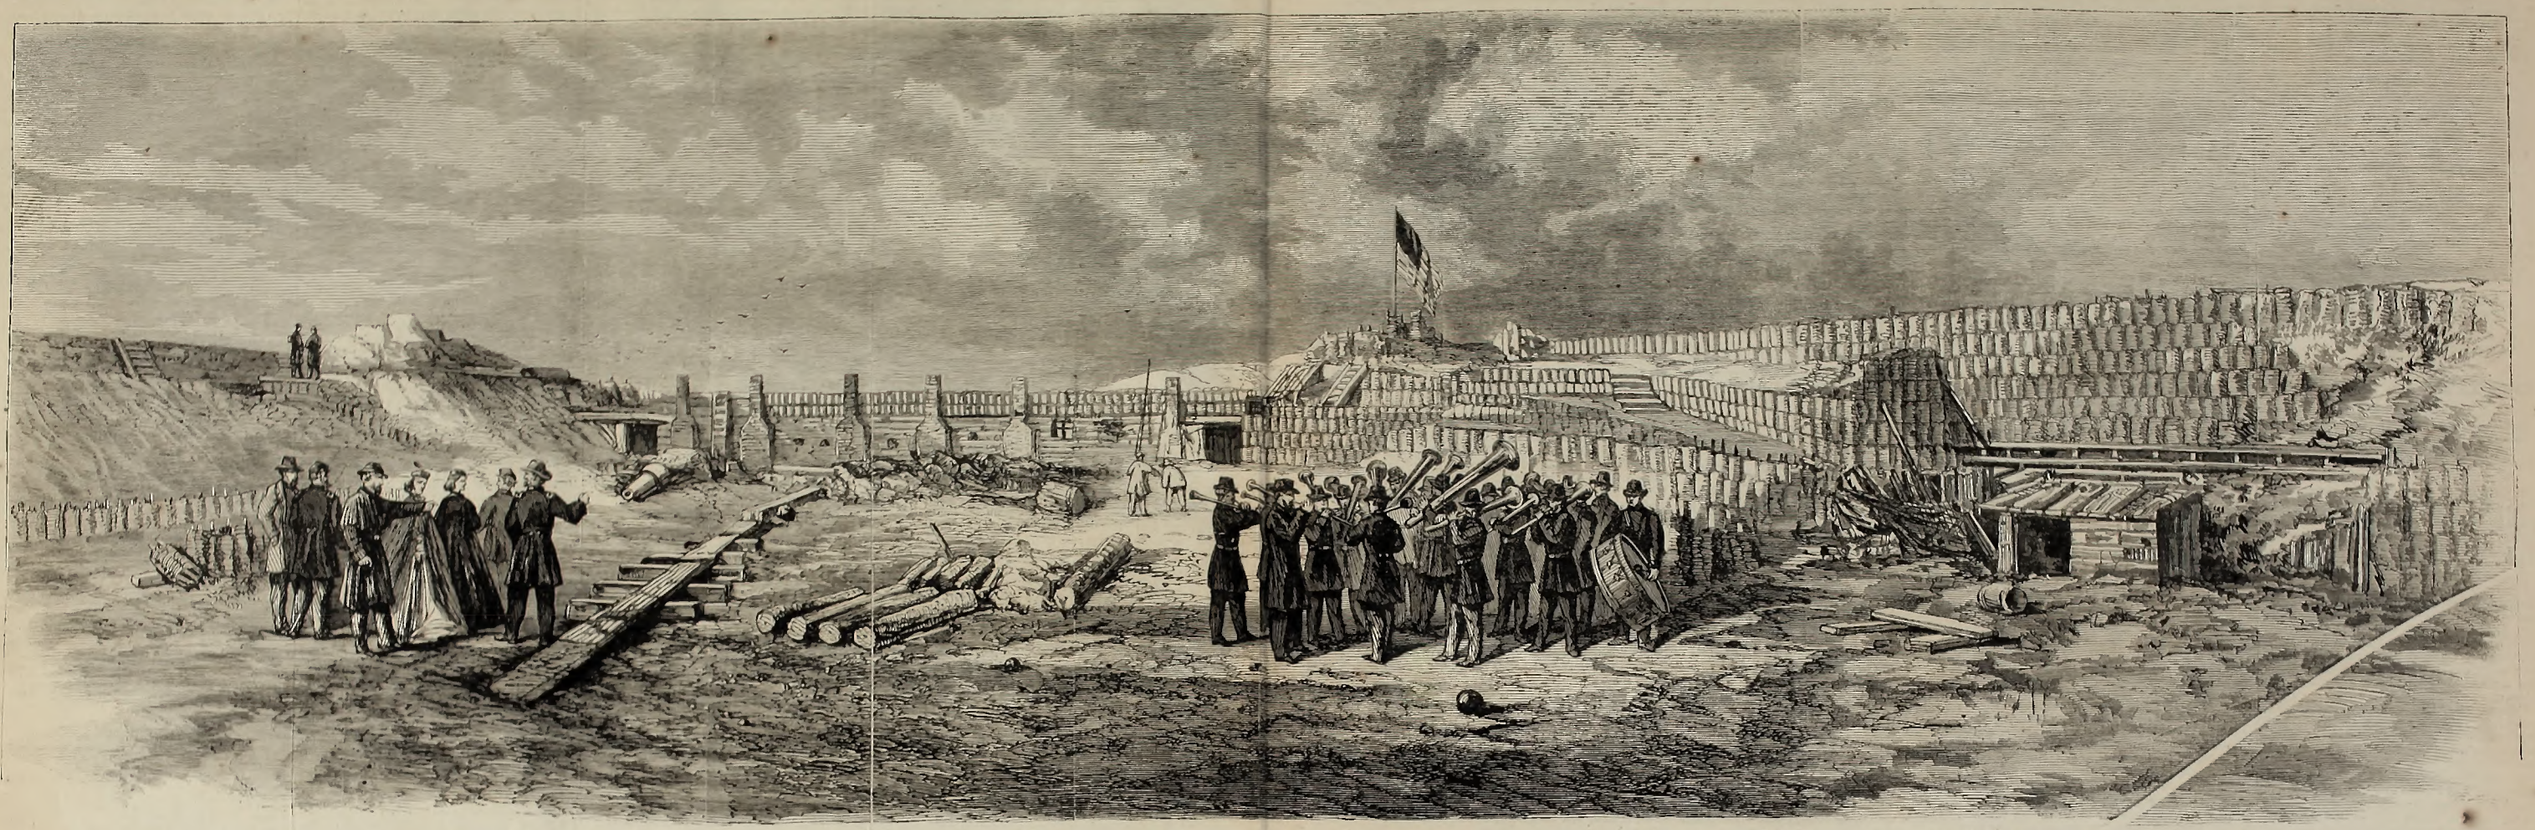
"The only guns now remaining are five or six on the Moultrie side in the middle tier of casemates. Five heavy guns are kept on the wall as well as attack by small boats, the garrison keeping under cover of the parapet whenever the enemy's gunboats shell it.

"Chevaux de frise of pointed sticks protect the fort from a sealing party. At the base outside are from the wall, and a heavy chain, on which are fastened a network of wire and chains kept in place by floating logs.

"I had the curiosity to make an inspection of the wall during the night, and was well rewarded for it by the remarks in Beauregard's attack. With my glass at that point I could see the wall was being repaired, and a close inspection shows that it was a very damaging fire. The wall was in many places torn away entirely, where the solid bolts crumbled the bricks to the dust. In the casemates the fire could be kept up without any considerable length of time there, that the wall would fall in. The object of that fire had to be filling up of the lower casemates."

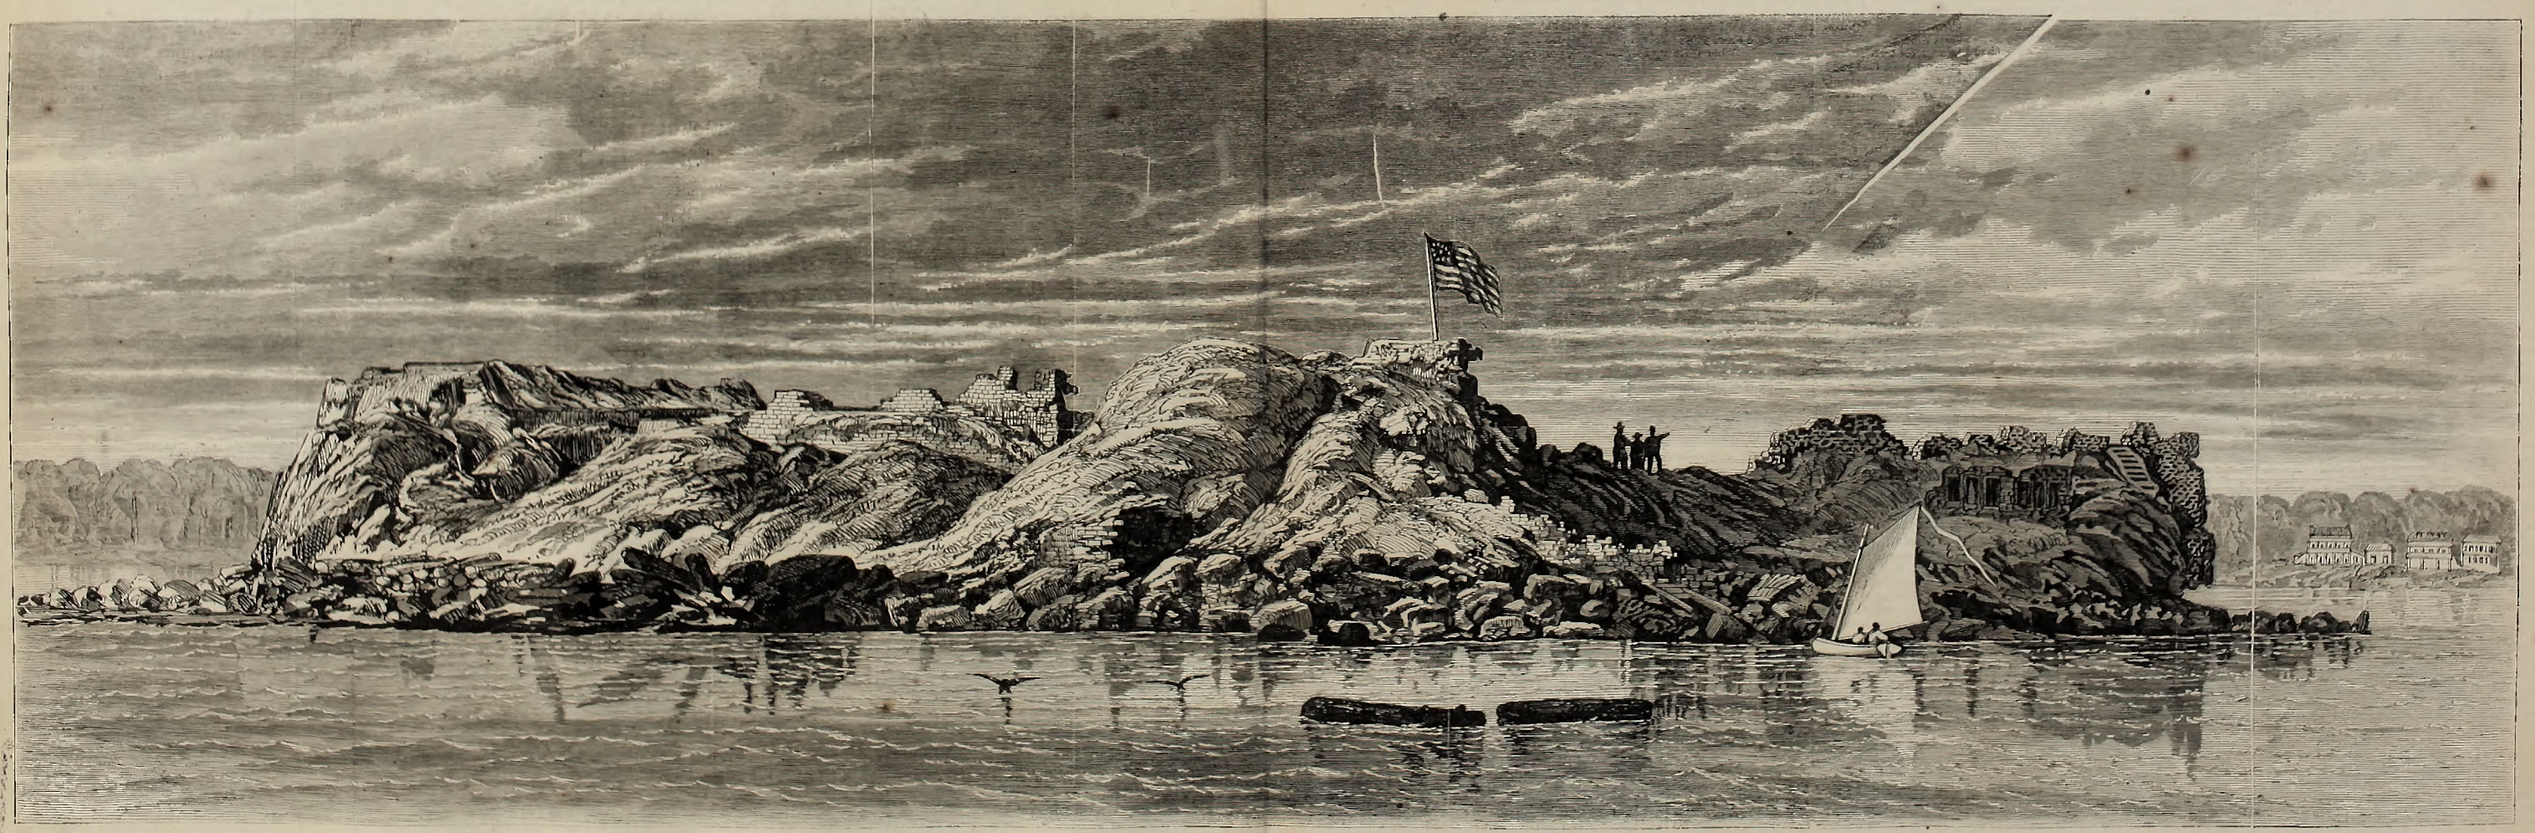
RICHMOND, FROM BELLE ISLAND.

BELLE ISLAND is a small island in the James, a little above the bridge which connects the Richmond and Petersburg railroad. It is about an acre and a half, and is reached by a ferry from there just at Rocketts 10,000 or 20 gallant soldiers pressed and slowly tortured. We will write to the Rebel Congress to request the Federal and English prisoners one-half the great wrongs the Southern chivalry have inevitably committed upon the Federal soldiers who have fallen into the power, a righteous retaliation would have been demanded by the allied nations. We would not have to wait a year, prisoners have been made which will soon release our brave soldiers from the fangs of a desperate and cruel foe.



We have so often described the rebel capital that we shall merely, on the present occasion, call attention to the spirit of the sketches. The prominent building is the Capitol: the five churches on the letter St. Paul's, Monumental, St. James', Second Presbyterian, Grace Street Methodist, the large building at the end of the bridge is Hospital, the tapering mill, the largest of the kind in the world, being thirteen storeys high.

Belle Island is the largest of the numerous islands that are scattered over the surface of the James, and well adapted for the purpose. A swift and turbulent current separates it from the shore, and a high bluff confines the prisoners on the mainland. Immediately at the back the continued mass of tumultuous rocks, which, in many places, are of stone, placed in a position to enfilade the island, and they are kept in readiness for any emergency that may arise.



DEEP-SEA soundings have at last become something like reliable. The result is, that the ocean, as far as explored, is found to be of a uniform depth of from five to six miles. The greatest known depth in the Atlantic is 27,366 feet, or about five miles and a half. It is not much less than the height of the highest mountains on the globe. It is supposed, however, to be much deeper than this between the Bahamas and the grand banks of Newfoundland, but the soundings on which the supposition is founded are not quite satisfactory.

BEAUREGARD was staggering along the other day after the snow, when an avalanche from the housetop thundered down, knocking the hat over his eyes and himself to the ground. His admirers of Nature was astonished to the last: "splendid thrilling!" and "Snowing ver' hard, and the air filled with meteors!"

We had no idea that South Carolina would ever have Gen. Sherman; but, strange to say, she has him in her very heart.

TWICE SMITTEN.

BY PIERCE GARY.

On dumbly-hoved and bruised red,
What can I offerin thy need?

Of heart, twice broken with its grief,
What words of mine can bring relief?

Oh soul, o'erwhelmed with woe again,
How can I soothe thy bitter pain?

Abashed and still, I stand and see
Thy sorrow's awful majesty.

Only dumb silence may convey
That which by tongue can never say.

I cannot comfort thee at all;
On the Great Comforter I call!

Praying that he may make thee see
How near he had been drawn to thee.

For unto man the angel guest
Still comes through gates of suffering bent;

And most our Heavenly Father cares
For whom he smites, not whom he spares.

So, to his chastening meekly bow,
Thou art of his beloved now!

CHAPTER XV.—A COMMERCIAL CRISIS.

THE private theatricals at the Cedars were postponed till Christmas, and in the middle of November Mr. Hilbery invited his household to a bow-windowed habitation at the western end of Brighton. Francis Tredethlyn followed, as in duty bound, and spent a great portion of his life in hurrying to and fro between London and Brighton by express trains. Never had a better adorer done suit and service to a mistress. There were no lovers' quarrels, no temporary estrangements between these two people. A serene and cloudless sky heralded the opening days of their union, and Maude declared again and again that she had never seen such a model pair of lovers.

"Harcourt and I were always quarrelling, you know, Julia," she said; "but then we were both such horribly jealous creatures. I didn't like his turning over music for other girls; though I suppose he was right, poor fellow, and I was a fool either turn over music or shut himself from society altogether. And he didn't like my going down to dinner with people to crack cavalry pleasants; but I'm afraid we rather enjoyed ourselves when we quarrelled, and I used to feel as if it would be the easiest life in the world to part from him for ever, and go into a convent, or marry somebody I hated, or something of that kind; and then directly he started, I used to get so wretched and miserable, and used to write him such penitent letters, taking all the blame upon myself, and making an idol of him. But it's no use to see you and Mr. Tredethlyn, and I'm sure he'll be the dearest husband in the world, Julia, and you'll be able to walk him round your little finger."

It was not with a feeling of unalloyed pleasure that Miss Desmond accepted her friend's congratulations. She was quite ready to admit that Francis Tredethlyn was a model lover, and promised to be a model husband; but the extensive husband that ever bored himself before a lover's dominion. His presents were munificent, his attention was unfailing, his temper serenely even; and yet there were times when Julia Desmond felt that all was not quite as it should have been.

She had angled very successfully, and the fish she had landed was a splendid prize, victoriously snatched from all other anglers; but oh, what a difference to her from that poor deluded fish, entrapped out of the free waters by the cruel hook on the angler, and the wiling bird which flies, of its own kind impulse, to the breast where it fain would shelter!

Julia Desmond knew that, in securing a husband, she had also secured a lover; and the knowledge pained and humiliated her. In a small thing that she should not love Francis; but it seemed very hard that Francis should not love her. Her womanly tact would have stood in the place of affection, and she would have been lavish in the expenditure of a generous love for the waylaid pretty words and tender looks, which should have had all the glitter and scene of the vibration of a true passion. But with Francis it was altogether different. The young man had no power to simulate, and there was a deadly coldness in the passion that chilled the proud Irish girl's heart.

"Are they worth the humiliation?" she thought sometimes, when she contrasted her lonely musings before the lighted glass in her bedroom at Brighton. "They are very big, and brilliant, and costly; but I've seen myself look fashionable with a scrap of scarlet ribbon twisted in my hair, than I look to-night with all these stars, and crosses, and serpents flashing and twinkling about me. And then when I go downstairs I must go through all the old stereotyped business; and when I thank him for the flowers that he sent me this morning, he will look at me with his cold eyes, and tell me he is pleased to have given me pleasure. What is he but a clod—a mere clod, nothing but a clod? I ought to remember that; and yet I am angry with him because he does not love me. Why can I not be thankful for my good fortune, and accept my future husband for what he is—a respectable, well-behaved gentleman, whom an accident has endowed with thirty thousand a year?"

Perhaps Miss Desmond did not particularly care to answer that question which she put to herself in so impatient a spirit. And yet it was a question that might have been answered had she cared to fathom the lower depths of her own mind; but then there are questions which are better left unanswered. Why was she angry with Francis Tredethlyn for that passionless serenity of manner which was nearly akin to indifference? Why? unless it was because in her own heart there lurked the consciousness that the unpolished Cornishman might have won a very different kind of lover, and that beneath his cold external there were slumbering embers which might have blazed into glory had one special torch been applied to them.

Yes, Julia knew this, and the knowledge was a perpetual pain to her proud and sensitive nature. The pride of the Desmonds had not been entirely trodden out beneath the iron heel of poverty. The girl, who had been taught from infancy to set herself to ensnare a rich husband, was yet proud enough to feel the bitterness of her degradation.

"If he only loved me," she thought, "I should feel that the bargain was a fair one. But to know that, at best, he only wishes to be fond of me, circumstances! He has been drifted into the position of a lover, and he performs the duties exacted of him; just like some unfortunate man who has been persuaded to dance in order to fill the last place in a quadrille, and who dashes listlessly through the figures, and always goes in the face of his partner. And yet I have seen him look at her until the dull clay of which he's made seemed to change into a thing of life and fire."

And thus Miss Desmond was fain to turn to her new lover for consolation, and to beguile her mind from unpleasant thoughts by the contemplation of all those grand things that may be done by wintry thousands a year.

If the young ladies of the household thought it a pleasant thing to spend the brief November afternoon at the Brighton festal esplanade beside the sea, Mr. Hilbery did not find a residence in Brighton so entirely convenient. A great deal of time was lost in the journeyings to and fro by the best and quickest express trains; the fatigue and there were days when even facilities of a speedy transit were too much for the merchant to take his dinner in the society of his beautiful daughter and her companion. There were occasions when he was forced to dine at a wearisome hour or so, trying vainly to amuse themselves in some feminine occupation, or to beguile the time by a solitary promenade on the pier, when soup grew cold and the Brightonian cook grew sullen, and then at last were fain to sit down at nine o'clock, and make a dismal pretence of dining without the head of the household.

"I sometimes think so much railway travelling must be bad for papa," Maude said, "I am afraid it must shake him a little; and there was in the Brighton express almost as good as Mr. Desborough, our Twickenham doctor, or some other Twickenham doctor, I don't know, for he won't listen to me. I can't tell you how anxious I am about him, Julia. He has had so many of his bad attacks lately, and I'm sure the dinners in Moorgate street has been so heavy. Ah, Julia! what is the good of being rich if papa must work as he does?"

Miss Desmond shrugged her shoulders.

"Business men seem scarcely to exist out of their offices," she answered impatiently. "I always took care to let Maude know that she looked down upon the Twickenham splendor and the Twickenham dinners. I hope your husband will devote himself to money-making as long as his lives."

"I sometimes think we might have been happier if we had been poorer," Maude said, dreamily, by-and-by. "I can't help fancying that we might have lived in a comfortable little place, in a low-roofed, old-fashioned cottage, with a garden all round it and a churchyard close by, and taken a pleasure in the simple duties of home, and then I need not have been separated from—"

She did not finish the sentence; she was talking to herself rather than to Julia, and was beautified by an inexpressible softness and tenderness as she murmured that broken sentence. Her thoughts wandered back to the past, to the time she and Harcourt Lowther had sworn eternal constancy, standing with their hands locked together in the dim twilight under the dark arch of the shadowy river. She thought of that time, and of the freshness of feeling that had gone down with it came back, and she could almost feel the breath of her from a distant ocean. How frivolous her life had been since them—how selfish and useless! What a round of fashionable dissipation and hurry and weariness! Harcourt Lowther's last letter was in her pocket as she sat musing despondently by the hired Brighton hearth—the last letter, a most melancholy epistle, full of despairing lamentations about the bitterness of separation and the hardships of Van Diemen's Land. And over and above all these feminine lamentations there appeared poor loving shade, there seemed real cause for anxiety in the state of Mr. Hilbery's health. It was not that the merchant himself complained, he did not complain, and, indeed, appeared to resent any allusion paid to his state, even when those inquiries came from one of a gentler sex than his only child. But every morning at the breakfast-table, sitting opposite to her father in the bright sunlight, Maude could see a darker shade under Mr. Hilbery's eyes, a more weary look about his haggard face. She dared not anger very often, and pleaded earnestly with him, imploring him to consult a physician, but his answer was always very much the same.

"I am subject to this sort of headache; my work in Moorgate street is peculiarly hard just now. Pray do not trouble yourself, Maude; there is not the least occasion for uneasiness about my health."

With such assurances as these Miss Hilbery was compelled to be satisfied. There had been an air of coldness, or almost displeasure, in her father's manner to her lately, and Maude found to her surprise that he was by no means pleased with her matrimonial engagement that had arisen between Julia Desmond and Francis Tredethlyn.

"Engaged to her!" the merchant exclaimed, when his daughter carried him the news of Julia's conquest. "Engaged to Julia Desmond! Why, I thought you had taken a fancy to your own account, Maude. I said nothing to you about the matter, my dear, for I'm very sometimes a absurd notions, and I thought it better to let things take their course. And so Julia has entrapped him, has she? I ought to have been on my guard against Ryan O'Connor Desmond's daughter."

"How can you talk like that, papa?" cried Miss Hilbery. "I'm sure Julia and Mr. Tredethlyn are really in love with each other, and dear Julia is perfectly disinterested. And, if Mr. Tredethlyn had been ever so much in love with me—he could never have cared the least bit about me—how could you suppose that I could ever dream of marrying him; when I—when he's such a very common-place person?"

Harcourt Lowther's name had been almost trembling on Miss Hilbery's lips, but she had remembered the fierceness of her father's nature, and had modified the conclusion of her sentence in deference to his prejudices.

"A very common-place person!" repeated Lionel Hilbery, in a thoughtful tone; "yes, you say dear, I dare say he is, I dare say he is. But I've seen enough of the world to have a very low opinion of common-place people, Maude, and I'm sorry you are married to commoner men than Francis Tredethlyn."

And then, after a brief silence, the merchant's manner changed with a sudden; he took his daughter in his arms, and pressed his lips upon her forehead with an almost passionate fondness.

"My darling child," he cried, "you don't think it wouldn't please me to see you married to a man you could love?"

Maude looked up into his face with a sweet smile upon her own, her lips parted, and in the next moment Harcourt Lowther's name would have been pronounced in a whisper plashed by tears and innocent lips. But it seemed as if her father in a manner anticipated what she would have said, for he put her from him suddenly, and turned away with a faint sheer of pain.

"I am very sorry to hear of this engagement between Julia and Francis Tredethlyn, my dear," he said, his face averted from his daughter, and his hands nervously shuffling among the papers on the table before him; "I am very much vexed, Maude, for Maude, you don't understand, you can't understand. Go, my dear, I'm busy."

No more had been or has been said between the father and daughter upon the subject of Miss Hilbery's matrimonial arrangements, but Maude had been shocked by her father's behavior. Vexation was not a matter of the moment, to be forgotten or remembered in the first surprise of the announcement. Lionel Hilbery was displeased, serious to Mr. Tredethlyn, but his manner towards his daughter was altogether changed. There were times when he scarcely took the trouble to conceal his displeasure from that young lady herself. He would walk up and down moodily when Francis Tredethlyn was by her side, and, sometimes, when the conversation gave him an opening, break out into muttered denunciations upon the the husband-hunting propensities of modern young ladies. Francis was too simple-minded to comprehend the merchant's ungracious temper; but Julia understood her benefactor, and defied him with her bold, handsome eyes, and her flashing teeth.

"If he wishes me to go, I must go," she said to her daughter, "I suppose; she thought, when she pondered on Mr. Hilbery's discourtesy. "What a spiteful, avaricious creatures these rich people are!"

Christmas was approaching, and that festival period of the year Brighton, like Cadiza, which place Maude Hilbery was tenderly attached, despite her sentimental talk about poverty and a cottage, became thronged to a thousand a year fold. The young ladies' portmanteaus had been packed ready for the departure from Brighton, the fly ordered to be in waiting for Mr. Hilbery to escort them on their homeward journey. He had not been so much with them during the last few days of their sojourn at the sea-side, Maude's delphy only came backwards and forwards with Mr. Hilbery, the girls had been left by themselves, with no better entertainment than occasional the reading of new books, the trying of new music, and the contemplation of the lustorous gray waves beating eternally against the bow-windows—for the weather had been cold and stormy of late, and the esplanade had been deserted, only an occasional masculine wayfarer, out for a "constitutional," buffeted the winds and strode in disdainful defiance along the pavement beneath Mr. Hilbery's windows.

It was only natural, under these circumstances, that the young ladies should have grown weary of Brighton. They had a close carriage at their disposal, but then driving through perpetual tempest is not pleasure that can be taken even in a close carriage. They went shopping in East street two or three times during the severe weather, and bought an extensive assortment of fashionable complications of Berlin wool work and gold beads; and experimentalising with the same on their return home, they found themselves plunged in a sea of perplexity. Thus it was that they grew very tired of Brighton, and wished most earnestly for Mr. Hilbery's coming.

"Oh, for the silvery ring of my own Broadwood!" exclaimed Maude, as she rose from a struggle with a German rendering of "Polly put the kettle on," in seven flats, and ten pages of double arpeggios. "I wonder who makes the pianos for houses that are let furnished? I'm sure they must all be made by the same man; and I suppose it's a theory of his own that makes him always use damp wood, and put so much flannel into his treble. I wish papa would come and take us home."

Miss Hilbery expressed this wish at least twenty times in a day, and Julia echoed it, as if out of politeness to her friend. But Miss Desmond was not a very sympathetic person, and she was really anxious to get back to the neighborhood of London that contained Francis Tredethlyn. Nearly a fortnight had passed since the Cornishman had been to Brighton, and Julia was terribly conscious that the link which would bind him to her was very fragile, and might be broken by any unlucky hazard, unless, indeed, his constancy were sustained by a chivalrous sense of honor. She had set her self the opportunity of discovering his sentiments on this delicate point, and had a vague idea that a small farmer's son, who had taken to Queen Caroline, would be unlikely to entertain the same splendid notions of truth and loyalty that glowed in the breasts of his superiors.

"I know that he's a very good fellow," Julia thought; "and I don't suppose he would steal anything, or tell a deliberate falsehood; but I dare say he would think it no sin to throw me over at the last moment if—"

There was a point at which Miss Desmond's reveries always stopped short. She did not care to think of the fate which Francis Tredethlyn might like to do, even if he were free to do as he liked.

Mr. Hilbery came home very late upon the evening of the last especially disagreeable day. He came down to Brighton by the mail train, and arrived at the hired mansion just as the two girls were sitting down together the sad meal of Maude's roods, preparatory to going to bed. But though the merchant had been so much longer away than usual, he was not disposed to put himself more out his daughter; for instead of coming up to the dining-room, he walked straight to a dreary little study at the back of the house, which had been set apart for his use.

Maude heard the sonorous knock at the big street door, and flew out of the drawing-room to greet the traveller.

"Papa, dear papa!" she cried, "We have been so dull and dreary as a set of Marianas in a moated grange. Oh, you daring papa, I am so glad you've come. Please take us home to Twickenham, we've had such a horrible time of it—so helpless and miserable as those poor working people who are not used singing so dreadfully flat when there's a hard frost. Oh, papa, papa, my single girls, and we've got no work to do," sang Miss Hilbery, in a shrill and established nasal drawl, as she skipped down the stairs.

"Kiss me, you wet, cold, melancholy-looking papa," Maude continued, hanging herself between Lionel Hilbery and the door of his study.

The merchant seemed in no very affectionate humor because his daughter made with out looking at her. His face was pale and stern in expression, and its gloomy rigidity was in no way relaxed when he spoke to Maude.

"Why are you so quiet to-day?" he said. "I thought you would have gone to bed an hour ago. I don't want to be disturbed to-night. Good-night, you're some papers down here that want looking to, and I brought other papers with me. I may have to sit up half the night, perhaps; and, remember, I am not to be disturbed."

"But you will be ill, papa, if you work so hard—"

"I shall not be ill, and I know what is best for myself. I cannot and must not be annoyed to-night, Maude."

He went into his room, where the servant had already made an illumination that would have been considered quite equal to a public display of five daring gas burners; but Maude followed him, and was not to be put off even by the hard look with the announced so strangely cold.

"Papa," she remonstrated, piteously, "I am sure that you are ill, or that something bas happened."

Mr. Hilbery laid his hand upon his daughter's shoulder, and put her out of the room—very gently, but with a certain determination which was quite a new thing in his treatment of this much-petted and spoiling Maude.

"I tell you, once more, that I am going to hewvy busy, and must not—be disturbed." He closed the door, for the third time slowly, at the stern utterance of them were a painful exertion. "Good night, my dear; go to bed, and sleep peacefully. God bless you, and take you in His keeping."

His manner changed all in a moment as he said this, and he stood for a few seconds with his arm round his daughter's waist, and kissed her passionately, as he had done on that other day when they had talked of Francis Tredethlyn.

But in the next moment Maude found herself standing outside the closed door of her father's study, wounded and unhappy. The sudden little gush of affection had been as perplexing to her as Mr. Hilbery's unusual storminess of manner. It was all very strange; and when Maude rejoined her as she went slowly upstairs to the big, barren drawing-room, which looked very little more homelike than a first-class waiting-room at a railway station.

Julia had disappeared, and the flaring gas lamps illumined a few dreary coral beads and scarcely carpet and emptiness. Dear Julia always remembered that her good looks were her only dower, and took care not to waste them by late watching in the glare of many gas burners. Maude sighed as she looked round the empty room, and then seated herself at a table adorned with a gaudy cover that looked like a small Turkey carpet. She took up the impossible Berlin wool work, and the gold beads, and set herself to the task of counting tiny dots and squares on a colored paper pattern, with a view to discovering where the Berlin wool left off and the beads began. But she was tired and unhappy, and the bewildering dots and squares made her head ache; so she pushed away the work presently, and roamed restlessly up and down the room; now stopping by a table, and taking up a book, only to open it haphazard, and stare blankly at the pages; now lingering by the piano, carelessly fingering the notes, and tormented with a wild desire to dash into some lively air—which she should startle the slumbering household.

Her father had told her to go to bed. He was going to work very late, and must on no account be disturbed. He had worked late sometimes at Twickenham, but not often, and on those occasions Mary had gone to sleep happily enough, only a little disturbed by the thought of "poor papa" toiling over those cruel business documents. But to-night it was altogether different. At the risk of incurring her father's anger, Miss Hillary paced wearily up and down the street of Brussels lace-shops, hating all she should hear the merchant's step on the stairs, and know that his night's work was over.

She watched, oppressed by a vague uneasiness, and wondering why she was uneasy. Why was it that to-night the thought of her father's toil mingled with all manner of strange fears and misgivings? She was usually so frivolous, so apt to look brightly out upon the sunnier aspects of the world around her; but to-night her heart seemed like a leaden weight in her breast. What was it? why was it? The clang of French clocks from the chimney-piece struck some abnormal number between twelve and twenty, and a distant church clock struck two; but still Miss Hillary sat in the vain for that expected step upon the stair. Her father had said that he would be very late, but she had known that in the worst hours he would be finished in a couple of hours. The time seemed intolerably long to Maude Hillary, rooming in a purpose-built house about that big, cold, quiet street in the bawdiness to listen to the hoarse roaring of the waves, or sitting down to read for five minutes together, but never once knowing what she was reading.

There had been so few troubles in her life, and looking back the time was smooth, sunlit years by which she had wandered from childhood to womanhood, she was seized all at once with a fear that there must be some terrible grief in store for her. It was quite impossible that she could have altogether withheld herself from some contemplation of that startling curse as to her right to be born into the world where so many people were miserable; but the question had never intruded itself upon her so awfully as to-night.

"I have never had sickness, or death, or sorrow near me," she thought. "My mother died before I was conscious of the existence—I think—and yet it seems strange that there can be any time when a child is unconscious of a mother's presence, or has not a sense of loss. The worst trouble that I can remember is my parting from Harcourt, and I have always hoped that all would come right at last. But to-night—to-night I feel as if there had been something sinful in my happiness. The sermons I have heard at church have never come to me. I never felt that I was a miserable, sinful creature, grouping my way upon a thorny path. I'm afraid I have been very wicked, selfish and idle, vain and frivolous."

Looking back at her life, Miss Hillary saw an existence of wholesome pleasures, study, exercise and picnics, Star and Garter dinners, perpetual Parisian bonnets, and turquoise bracelets, pet dogs, and, above all, a most devoted attachment. Perhaps she had never before watched and waited alone at these still hours of the dead winter night, and those unwonted thoughts may have been only the natural companions of her loneliness.

She looked at her watch a dozen times in an hour, and as there was constantly three o'clock there, her patience was exhausted all at once, and she resolved on going down to her father's room.

"He will be very angry with me for waking up so late," she thought, "but I cannot go to bed until I have seen him. It will be better to see him over so cross with me, than not to see him at all."

Having once arrived at this determination, Maude Hillary ran down stairs and tapped lightly at her father's door. There was no answer, and she repeated that timid tapping. Again there was no answer, and she tried the handle of the door, unclosed it softly an inch or two, and saw the merchant at his work. But the door was locked, and her breath grew thick with the sudden oppression caused by that vague terror. She had all command over herself, and knocked loudly, calling, in a frightened voice:

"Papa! papa!"

It was not so strange that she should be frightened. Every one who had heard of her dreaming city magnates suddenly stricken down in the prime of life by some fell disease, unsuspected until that last fatal moment.

A heavy step inside the little room relieved her of these vaguely terrible fears. The door was opened, and Miss Hillary stood before her, very pale, very angry.

"Maude! How absurd this is! What have you been doing? Why have you been sitting up?"

"Because somehow I couldn't go to bed while you were working down here, papa darling. I couldn't; I didn't want to worry you or disobey you; but I don't know what's the matter with me to-night. All manner of ridiculous things crept into my head, and I felt that I must see you before I went to sleep. Let me come in, papa."

She pleaded very timidly, looking up in her father's face with such tender devotion beaming in her blue eyes, that Miss Hillary must have been something harder and stronger than the ordinary run of mercantile men if he had been deaf to her pleading.

"Come in if you like, Maude," he said, with a weary sigh; "I am sorry that you disturbed me. I had very nearly finished my work."

The littered mass of papers that had been scattered on Mr. Hillary's desk when Maude had left him were gone now, and only a few neat little packets remained in their stead. But, placed conspicuously upon the desk, Maude perceived a big envelope with a great red seal, and lying near it a smaller envelope, also sealed.

The merchant had removed his neckcloth. He seemed to have been working hard, for big drops of moisture stood upon his forehead. A great basket near his chair was filled to overflowing with torn scraps of paper, and the shower of waste had fallen far and wide, and lay like snow about the floor in which Mr. Hillary had been sitting.

"Now, Maude," he asked, sternly, as his daughter followed him into the room, "what is it that you want with me?"

"Why, to see you leave your work and go to bed, papa. You don't look well, I'm afraid."

The merchant smiled a grim smile, and pointed to his watch which lay open on the desk.

"I shall have been working half an hour. I've kept watch upon every quarter of an hour," he said.

"But you have finished now, papa."

"Quite. I have very nearly finished—but not quite."

Miss Hillary shook her head with a pretty pouting expression of face that in the least afraid of her father's anger now. She had been so tortured by the dim and shadowy apprehensions, that her anger was beyond endurance now that she was by her father's side, and she was bold enough to defy him.

"I shall leave you any more to-night, papa. If you had all the business of the Stock Exchange to transact, I wouldn't let you sit up any longer, sitting upright in a chair like those fine-arts some papers. Besides, your desk is quite clear, you seem to have done everything."

"No, I have not done everything," she heard her father say in a low, hoarse voice.

Mr. Hillary had resumed his seat and was staring blankly at the desk before him, where all things looked so neat and orderly. Maude was almost justified in thinking that her father's work was finished. There was a row of drawers on each side of the desk. One of them was open, and a bunch of keys hung from the lock. A copy of the Times newspaper lay across the top of this open drawer; but as Miss Hillary looked over her father, some portion of her silken flounces or other fluffinesses of her dress caught the paper, and it fell rustling to the ground. Lionel Hillary turned suddenly with a look of alarm directed towards the open drawer, and Maude following his glance, saw something lying among the neat packets of letters and papers—something which looked like a pistol. The merchant instantly seemed to realise a greater terror than any that her fancy had shaped, however dimly, during those hours of weary waiting in the room above.

GOING HOME!

Wind and weary, wandering bee,
O'er this wide waste of waters free,
Where no soul-like music tone,
Speaking love, gives strength to thee,
Footsteps fall, nor sign of life,
Sinks when thus thy footsteps roam!
Thy spirit cries, while tears will start,
Take me home—oh, take me home!

When lights of youth-time wane,
And the world grows cold and drear,
When life's hopes appear as vain,
And its pleasures turn to woe,
There is yet a land of love,
Bright'ner visions while we roam;
And the happy spirit cries,
Going home—yes, going home!

MARY CANAVAN.

It became part of my lot in life to help the Irish famine sufferers in the eventful period of the Irish Famine of 1846-7.

I was a Poor Law Inspector, and had a large district assigned to me, which necessarily set me about a good deal and visit workhouses, hospitals and relief stations in the discharge of my duties. My mode of conveyance was a rude one—an outside Irish jaunting car, and, with one horse, or rather indeed with a pony, I used of a day sometimes to get over a good deal ground.

I started one morning in the early spring from my headquarters to visit a station in a very remote part of my district. The weather was bad, a servant, coachman, groom, butler, valet, all comprised in one very original and funny individual called "Mick" accompanying me. The road before I left on this particular journey, in which occurred an incident which I am about to relate, I told Mick to see that my pistol was all right in case our wish ire bred, which I used to take in my pocket, and above all not to forget to fill my flask with brandy, which, as well as my official see, was not altogether not a necessary luxury. Mick, a hardy native boy, was driving along the road with a heavy shower of rain, and, as my official knowledge were in the receipt of the full amount of pay for the day, I felt that I was starved, and avidity with which they seized and devoured the loaves of rye bread I used to give them from the cart, I satisfied me that the money which we sent to our Poor Law Inspectors from all parts of United Kingdom to expend in any way we thought fit, and which for the most part was applied to the establishment of bakehouses, did all the good which it was intended to do, and even more than the promoters of the scheme had anticipated.

I scarcely think I was ever out on a more lovely day then it it to which I allude, and if one could only have felt the invigorating breeze for a few minutes, and then turned off by a mountain road which led by a long descent to a wild and barren bog, stretching unbrokenly for many miles towards the sea coast. As we got on the bog, there was an indication that there had been a turf road, but gradually its traces became more and more indistinct, and we had to make the best of our way across the "blasted heath." At last we came to a road again, and I was enabled to shape my course for the relief station, which I was about to inspect.

The path, or road, or whatever else one might choose to call it, was straight, and so there was nothing to interrupt the view right before us.

Mick, who I never could indeed bring myself up in himself, and had been discoursing eloquently on the value of good sound roads, gave me his private opinion as to the character of that on which we were then travelling, suddenly called out:

"What ails you, sir, is that before us?"

"Where?" said I.

"Don't you see, sir? The Lord save us! a body stretched across the road!"

On looking before me, at about a hundred yards distance, I saw that to which Mick directed my attention.

"Yes," said I, "no doubt it is some poor creature who has died on the way to the station —but what could one know?"

On coming up we found it was the corpse of a woman apparently about forty years of age.

A circumstance I was to see the effects of famine, I was horrified at the ghastly appearance which she presented. Her face was literally so emaciated that there was not all the vascular and arterial anatomy as well as if the skin had been removed.

While looking at this horrid sight, it seemed to me that she could not have been very long dead, and that some life was in her bosom around.

"Possibly," I said, "life is not quite extinct," and, recollecting the little smattering of doctoring which I possessed in early life, I thought it worth while to see what effect a stimulant might have.

"Bring me my brandy flask at once, Mick," said I, "and help me to raise her head."

"For shin, sir?" said he. "Indeed, it would take more than your honor could do to bring her back again."

"Well," I added, "do what I tell you, Mick, and let us hope for the best."

We lifted the body and placed it against a little hillock which was quite close to where we found the woman, and I then proceeded to open her mouth, a proceeding attended with considerable difficulty. Holding her head back I managed to pour down her throat a few drachms of my flask (a pretty large one, by the way) down her throat, when suddenly I felt a sort of convulsion at the back of her throat which set on my heart's blood. A convulsion was to my great delight speedily followed by a faint hiccup, and I at once made up my mind that the poor creature I might be in the intense satisfaction of restoring a fellow-creature to life.

Mick and I then set to work, and taking the cushions of the car we stretched our poor patient in a recumbent position. We then commenced to rub all over with flannels were like fire, and with a good will we rubbed and rubbed until we were rewarded by seeing the head move, the lips twitch, and the whole frame evidently in a returning vitality. But to succeed must be a work of some time, and here we were nearly fifteen miles away from the station. We would not, however, for a little time longer, and then I determined to get as fast as I could to my destination. We placed her on the car in a sitting position, and started for

We had not gone more than four or five hundred yards when I perceived a most abominable stench, which was so sickly that I determined to stop and ascertain what it was. Looking to my right hand direction was revealed to me a column of bluish smoke, which came out of the bog. Walking over to the place from whence the smoke issued, I was instantly able to discover the offensive odor, which became worse and worse. I found to my horror that the smoke was from a human habitation. It could be called a mud old gravel pit, in which I very soon found the cause of the stench. Here were laying two bodies in an advanced state of decomposition, an old man and woman. I shudder now when I think of the sight I saw. It was horrible beyond description. However, as at once was that they were, we found on the road had crept out of this hovel on seeing the car coming across the bog, and had sunk in the listless state of exhaustion in which we found her.

Mick and I turned out to be when I made subsequent inquiry.

We now resumed our journey, and at last arrived at the station, where I lost no time in getting medical relief for my poor patient, and in sending to the gravel pit to have the bodies removed and interred.

The next day I returned to headquarters, and from time to time afterwards had letters from the doctor reporting the case that was doing very speedily recovered, and out of moneys placed at my disposal for charitable purposes I was enabled to contribute to her comfort in the shape of clothing.

A con le of months or more passed away, and the whole affair was almost extinguished by the abundance of food which came into the country. The people began to look better, and every one was a believer in plenty.

My visits to the remoter stations of my district were necessarily fewer, for I had important duties to perform at the town in which I lived, and where the union workhouse was situated. They were now principally directed to the prevention of abuse in the administration of relief. Though the distress was still great, yet it was an undoubted fact within the experience of all those engaged in the Poor Law service, that abuses crept in to a very large extent, and it was no easy matter to control them.

On another lovely morning, now far advanced in the summer, I again started for the station at —, near which occurred the incident which I have been endeavored to tell. As I passed by the spot where our progress on the road was arrested by the body of the poor woman, Mick said:

"Ah, your honor, glory be to God and thanks to you, do you recollect the craythre we saw here?"

"Yes, Mick," said I, "and I hope we shall never see such a sight again."

"Amen, sir," said he, giving the pony a gentle reminder that he was to get along as quickly as he could.

We drove on for a couple of miles, when we had a group of the peasantry of the district going to the relief station for their rations of Indian meal stirabout.

I signed to make some inquiries when suddenly I felt by my knees embraced, and a girl about eighteen years of age kissing my feet.

"What, in the name, my good girl?" said I.

"Ah! your honor," she said, looking at me with an expression I can never forget, "don't you recollect Mary Canavan?"

"Mary Canavan! surely you cannot be the woman I——"

"Ah! yes, sir," she cried.

And there she was, the shrivelled bag of forty transformed into a girl of eighteen, and all by the simple administration of wholesome food for a few weeks.

To those who saw scenes such as I did this did not appear extraordinary change. But, at the lapse of time, when the great famine of Ireland with all its horrible circumstances is well-nigh forgotten, I venture to tell this story about poor Mary Canavan.

GREAT COMMERCIAL FEATURES

in the Inauguration Procession.

HAD an ancient Roman suddenly dropt from the clouds during the grand procession, he would have at once recognised the existence of some new trade or industrial trophies introduced into it. No other people so openly avows their mechanical ingenuity as one of the chief pillars of the national greatness as the American, more especially the citizens of the Empire City.

One of the most striking features in the great Fête was the display made by some of our prominent manufacturers. We have selected none of the most characteristic of these, and engraved them for our pages, the working mind of New York enters into the celebration of its many victories.

The Singer Manufacturing Co.

This company made a display in the procession, which was the subject of much commentaries with the magnitude of its enormous business. Their car, drawn by six horses, decorated with red, white and blue plumes, drawing, in fact, the whole of their factory in miniature, was supplied with the national colors, and in which eight young ladies were engaged in operating the Singer sewing machines, in the manufacture of army clothing. On either side of the car appeared the inscribed the following unique and telling motto:

"We clothe the Union army—the Grants "dressing the rebels."

Following this was a four-horse team gaily dressed, and too loaded with boxes, drawing the wagon of the company, loaded with Sewing Machines, directed to some of the principal branch houses located in the several quarters of the world, the whole preceded by a rail car, drawn by two horses, and filled with officers of the company. The men marched in platoons, with guidons indicating the respective branches of the business to which they belonged.

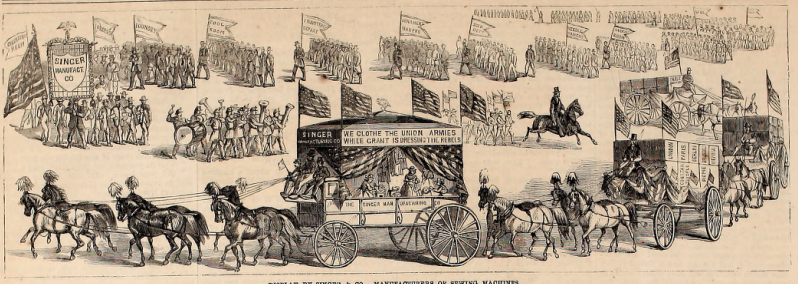
Altogether, this was doubtless one of the most attractive, as it was the most substantive, display made by any one establishment in the city, and one that could only be exceeded by any in the world. It is in keeping, however, with the well-known character of the Singer Manufacturing Company.

Howe & Bouvier's Improved Standard Scales.

Another most important branch of industry was also especially represented. We allude to the Scales, one of the most ancient and Scriptural of inventions. Messrs. Howe & Bouvier, 491 Broadway, have made a special application for the unwarning accuracy of their machines, their well known motto, by three keys, one of which is fitted up, in which the "sense, sense, sole! spirit-ed" branch of trade was set forth. But our duty as well pedicted the scene is that further description is needed. Every one knows that by these scales can be had without a pair of scales, and that no lady can proceed to her marketing without the possession of one. As a natural result, all our fair readers quote to call upon Messrs. Howe & Bouvier without delay.

Steinway & Sons.

The musical art was represented by the celebrated firm of Steinway & Sons, whose "Grands" were on a car 32 feet premium, gold and silver medals at the principal World's Fairs, and the Crystal Palace, for many years, and who gained a first prize medal at the great International Exhibition in London, 1862.

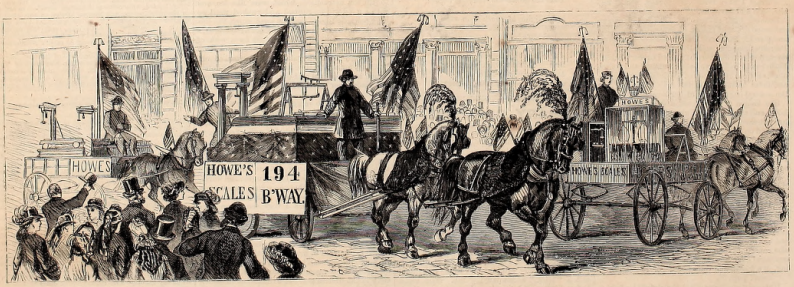


One of their grand pianos was drawn on a large car, with several gentlemen performing with great enthusiasm others. It was a very imposing spectacle and attracted much attention.

Herring & Co.

This famous company demonstrated their sympathy for the cause of liberty by a large wagon containing one of those indestructible safes, which bid defiance to the famous pillaging of the 19th of July, and the consideration that any safe can be formed of the immense fire and burglar proof materials of their patent safes. It is really quite a study of art, and it is not too much to say that this exhibition of theirs has created such a point of excellence in their manufacture, that their safes may now be pronounced perfectly indestructible.

The Indians dwelling within the United States are fast disappearing from among men. In 1850 there were 400,764; in 1860, 339,949; and the census of 1870 shows only 295,400. This is a decrease of 70,300 in twenty years. The proportion of whites to Indians is augmented as the path of empire takes its way westward. Here in New York there are still 6,000 left, while in the Indian savage will exist only in history, the prose poem of Cooper and the poetry of Longfellow. The civilized Indian flourishes better than the wild one. The census in the State of New York gives an average of 30,964; Washington territory, 31,000; Utah territory, 20,000; Minnesota, 17,000; California, 16,149; Kansas, 8,126; Michigan, 7,777; Nevada territory, 7,750; Oregon, 7,000.



The following startling threat was made one of the other day by an excited pugilist: "If I twist you round your own neck, and run you for a mile over your own mouth, and run you down your own throat until there's nothing left of you but the extreme ends of your shirt-collar sticking out of your eyes." His opponent left.

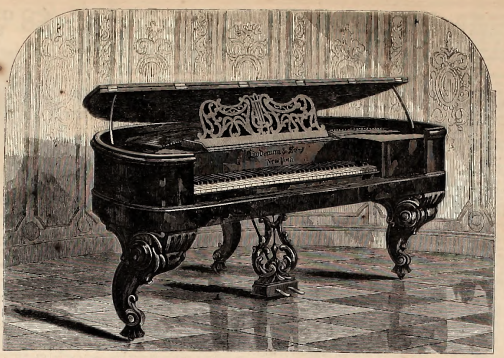
LINDEMAN & SONS' Patent Cycloid Pianofortes.

THE great importance attached to this invention, both by professional men and mechanics, involving as it does an entire change in the construction of the instrument, has induced us to place it before our readers in such a form that the whole scope of the improvement may be made perceptible to all. The positive, nay the wonderful improvements made in the pianoforte within the last ten years are patent to everybody who has given even one thought to the subject, but those who have thought will agree with us, that a vast amount of humbug has been foisted upon the public by manufacturers, who, for the purpose of making advertising capital, have tinkered up some minute difference, of no earthly consequence, to which they give a high sounding name, and thereby set forth to the world on the wings of the press, as a great patented improvement, although the most earnest searcher after facts, aided by a 40 horse-power microscope, could not discover the faintest vestige of an advantage gained. The cycloid piano, however, presents at the first glance an unmistakable and radical change in the form, and the advantages which arise from the change in the form are as marked as the change itself.

Before proceeding to investigate the advantages claimed, we will give a brief sketch of the firm from whose ingenuity the cycloid piano springs. The elder Lindeman commenced life as a journeyman pianoforte maker in Dresden, where, after some time, he established a business of his own, and made pianos which were much esteemed at this day. In 1835 he came to America and again commenced to work as a journeyman, but the crash coming threw him upon his own resources, and he left New York for Jamaica, L. I., where for several years he made pianos on his own account.

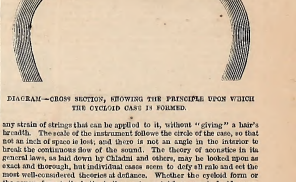


In 1842 he returned to the city and commenced his present business, having taken his sons into partnership. The young men, like their father, working out the details he was greatly assisted by his brother Henry, who felt the full value of the idea. The first instrument of this class was turned out about a year and a half ago. It was immediately purchased by a prominent gentleman of this city, and was closely watched by the brothers, as upon its success depended whether they should follow the plan or abandon it. At the end of ten months they found that the instrument had not only improved in tone, but that it remained in perfect tune, although it had never been tuned since it left their factory. They were satisfied that these extraordinary results were due to the immense strength of the frame, and proceeded at once to organize the system for the manufacture of the cycloid piano in large quantities. Eight months have barely elapsed, yet the demand for the cycloids has become so general that Lindeman & Sons have been compelled to double their business, and to make preparations to enlarge their factory by extending it to Bleecker street, and to still further increase their business by the 1st of May.

The following full and minute description of the manufacture of the cycloid, and the results obtained by the cycloid or arch form, which we find in the New York daily Tribune, will convey all the necessary information in regard to the valuable improvements achieved by Lindeman & Sons:

"The cycloid piano, made and patented by Lindeman & Sons, of this city, presents a radical change in the form of the piano, and while adopting all the improvements which have resulted from past experience, exhibits a novel ity in construction which adds a value to all that has gone before, and presents increased advantages of such importance that they cannot be over looked. The form of the cycloid may be described as a square piano with the back corners rounded off. The sweep is very graceful, and the ugly square box is transformed into an elegant piece of furniture, beautifully finished all round, forming an ornament to the parlor, and taking up much less space than the ordinary square piano.

"The object designed to be obtained by this change of form is elegance, compactness and strength. In the square piano the sides and back are glued together, and to strengthen these weak points heavy blocks of wood are inserted, so that the whole space of the two back corners is utterly useless for reverberating purposes. They are simply wasted wood, and are only valuable inasmuch as the blocking they contain strengthens the inherent weakness of the square case.



"The cycloid plate achieves the form of the arch, which is recognised as the type of strength, and is in fact a solid case, in one piece, with no weak spot about it. By the system of constructing the case, more strength is obtained than could be got from a solid block, either cut out or bent to the cycloid form. The case in fact consists of from 24 to 36 veneers, one-fourth of an inch thick, of maple wood, glued together; these are placed in a press of the cycloid form, to which are attached screws of great power. The force is applied equally to every part, which forces out the superfluous glue, and, when cold, these veneers come out a solid mass, having the required cycloid form, with all the strength of an arch, and capable of sustaining any strain of strings that can be applied to it, without "giving" a hair's breadth. The scale of the instrument follows the circle of the case, so that not an inch of space is lost, and there is not an angle in the interior to break the continuous flow of the sound. The theory of acoustics in its general laws, as laid down by Chladni and others, may be looked upon as exact and thorough, but individual cases seem to defy all rule and set the most well-considered theories at defiance. Whether the cycloid form or the square form is the better in theory, is a point for savans to decide upon, but the result of the two forms is palpable to every ear, learned or unlearned. The tone of the cycloid is as solid as that of a grand pianoforte—it is not merely loudness, which is always liable to impure and loose vibra were all practical pianoforte makers, and thus were enabled to supervise and direct every branch of the manufacture. The result of this combination was, that from the first their instruments were solidly and faithfully made and the reputation of the firm stood high as trustworthy makers. The idea of the cycloid form was conceived by Herman, the eldest son, but circumstances prevented him carrying it out until a year or two since. In tions, but it is the largest amount of sonority, with the greatest purity in quality of tone. A powerful player can use it as he would a grand, and he cannot break the tone; he cannot thin it or confuse it by forced diverging vibrations. Gottschalk tested it in every way to the utmost, and acknowledged that it triumphed over the test that he had applied.

"But it is not in force alone that the purity of the cycloid is pre-eminent; in the medium tone and in the pianissimo it is surpassingly beautiful, and even the soft pedal can be used without destroying the pure and individual quality of the tone. In addition to this, while each tone is round and distinctive, in close or spread harmony, no one tone predominates, but a perfect accord of combined tones swells up to the fingers, and dies out without one dominant vibration. The "singing" power partakes of the same purity of quality. It can be prolonged in a remarkable degree, and the quality of the vibration does not change or "lift," but preserves its roundness until the sound has ceased. The cycloid possesses one other point of superiority over the common square piano, namely, the power of standing in tune. The whole structure is so compact, so solid, so rigid and unyielding in its strength, that it will remain up to con...t pitch from its first tuning, allowing for the stretching of the strings, and will not fall a shade for months.

"These qualifications are great in their significance, and elevate the class of instrument, hitherto represented by the square piano, far above its present position as a musical instrument. The tone is larger, purer, and more beautiful every way; and for strength and durability in its initial excellence, we believe that it will prove superior after years of trial to every other plan of construction. Its mechanical details and workmanship are of the best quality, and its touch is all than can be required by the most exacting professor or amateur. The system upon which the present cycloid piano is made is equally applicable to the grand and upright form, and we look forward to the result of the experiments in this line which will, we understand, be immediately proceeded with, as a matter of vital interest to refined and civilised communities all over the world, for there is hardly one respectable homestead in which the piano is not considered not merely as a luxury but a necessity.

"We consider the cycloid piano as a great advance upon the prevailing system of construction, and as approaching as near a perfect instrument as our present knowledge enables us to conceive or to construct."

We recognise in the above a faithful and graphic description of the beautiful instrument it treats of, and we cordially endorse all the praise which it bestows. Lindeman & Sons have in their possession the warmest testimonials from many of the most eminent musicians, but they do not deem it necessary to publish them to the world, for the reason that makers of pianos, of every grade of merit, have pursued that system until it has become worse than useless as a guarantee of excellence. The writer in the Tribune adverting to this custom says:

"There is another fallacy which is rapidly exploding itself, namely, the value of professional testimonials. So long as professional players and teachers, whether for a consideration or not is a point between themselves and the manufacturers, gave their testimonials, or written opinions, to all good makers, they were of value to each according to his use of means to advertise the facts to the world; but as soon as certain players and teachers bind themselves to certain houses, and declare that what they have testified to for other houses before is all fol-de-rol, or a tissue of no-such-things, their so-called testimonials become of less value than the paper on which they are written, and their motives are left open to very grave suspicion. The public begins to understand the value of testimonials. Good wine, they say, 'needs no bush;' neither does a good piano need testimonials from professional gentlemen, four-fifths of whom are profoundly ignorant of the construction of the instrument, or of what constitutes its real merits."

The truth of the foregoing cannot be doubted, and it is well that the facts of the case should be broadly stated and widely published. The verbal opinions of some of the most eminent musicians we have heard. Gottschalk tried the cycloid thoroughly, and pronounced it the "finest instrument of the square class which he had ever tried; that the tone came out as rich and solid as that of a grand; that he had tested it as he would a grand piano for points of delicacy and points of strength, and that it had stood the test in every way, and that the inventor had a brilliant fortune in his hands." Wm. Mason, J. N. Pattison, A. H. Passe, C. Fradel, Harry Sanderson, W. K. Bassford, and many others have given verbal evidence of the pre-eminent excellence of the cycloid piano.

We consider the new method of manufacture of pianos, as illustrated in the structure of the cycloid piano, as destined to work a complete revolution in the mode of making square pianos. Its superiority of tone, its extraordinary strength, its capacity to stand longer in tune than any other instrument, and its exceeding beauty of form will assuredly arrest the attention of the public, and cause a universal demand for the cycloid pianos which no one maker will be able to supply. We congratulate Lindeman & Sons on the sterling excellence of their invention, and we are satisfied that their business energy and enterprise will realise for them a brilliant fortune, while their piano will give to the public an instrument more perfect than any now manufactured.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

CURRAN's ruling passion was his joke. In his last illness, his physician observing in the morning that he seemed to cough with more difficulty, he answered, "That is rather surprising, as I have been practising all night."

A diminutive attorney, named Else, once asked Jekyll:

"Sir, I hear you called me a pettifogging scoundrel. Have you done so, sir?"

"No, sir," said Jekyll, with a look of contempt. "I never said you were a pettifogger or a scoundrel; but I did say you were little Else."

To win the maid the poet tries,
And sonnets writes to Julia's eyes,
She likes a verse, but—cruel whim!—
She still appears averse to him.

"I WISH, revered father," said Curran to Father O'Leary, "that you were St. Peter, and had the keys of heaven, because then you could let me in."

"By my honor and conscience," replied O'Leary, "it would better be for you that I had the keys of the other place, for then I could let you out."

AN Irishman, charged with an assault, was asked by the judge whether he was guilty or not.

"How can I tell," was the reply, "till I have heard the evidence?"

[illegible] MOORE, who derived his pedigree from Noah, explained it in this manner: "Noah had three sons, Shem, Ham and one more."

"COME here, Johnny, and tell me what the four seasons are."

Young Prodigy: "Pepper, salt, mustard and vinegar."

WE would call special attention to B. T. Hayward's advertisement, in another department of this issue. Our gallant troops in the Union service can obtain from him every desirable style of Company, Regimental, Brigade, Division or Corps Pins, Badges or Emblems. As every patriot prides himself on his particular Company, Regiment or Corps, and wishes to decorate his manly breast with an honorable Badge, designating his connections, and thousands, not knowing how to obtain them, we take pleasure in referring them to Mr. Hayward's advertisement, in which will be found all that is desired in that line. Mr. Hayward is one of our largest and oldest Manufacturing Jewelers, and is the leading manufacturer of the Army Badges. In fact, his is the only reliable house to deal with. He can be relied upon for quality of goods, promptness and faithfulness in filling all orders. Our "Masonic" friends will also find everything in their line appertaining to masonry.—Army and Home Journal.

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical

is a PREVENTIVE of SICKNESS. The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years convinces him that it is time the public had an article offered that will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, designed for all classes, old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but is entirely new to the public. One quart bottle will last a well person one year. This is rather a new mode of doctoring; nevertheless it will save millions from being sick. Is it not better to pay three dollars a year to keep from being sick, than to pay ten or twenty dollars in doctor's bills, and as much more for the loss of time and the inconvenience of being sick? To prevent sickness, use as follows: Add one teaspoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the first thing after you rise in the morning, and the same before you retire at night. It will increase the strength and give vigor and action to the system. A celebrated New York merchant, who has made a thorough trial of the Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that he gained ten pounds of flesh in one month at the first trial. He continues its use as above directed, and finds it very beneficial; says it has proved an entire preventive to sickness in his case. Also, another well-known gentleman in New York has used the Medicated Cider constantly for ten years, and has not been sick one day during that time.

Price $3 per bottle (full quart); pints, $2; half-pints, $1. One quart bottle, two pint bottles, or four half-pint bottles, sent free by Express on receipt of price. All orders should be addressed to

What the "Press" say of Us.

GREAT GIFT DISTRIBUTION.—A rare opportunity is offered for obtaining watches, chains, diamond rings, silverware, etc., by Messrs. Arundale & Co., 84 No. 187 Broadway. They have an immense variety of articles, varying in value from $1 to one hundred for $1 each. The mystery of the thing is that you get what you like. A distribution is very fairly made, enclosed in an envelope, certificate of the article you draw. Your dollar returned if you are not satisfied with what you get. Certainly worth a trial, which will certainly be worth something to all concerned, and may be worth $100 and more than this at investing a dollar.—Sunday Times, New York City, Feb. 19, 1865.

Messrs. Arundale & Co. have long been personally known to us, and we believe to be doing a very respectable and legitimate business.—New York Scottish American Journal, June 11, 1864.

Messrs. Arundale, in the office of Arundale & Co.'s Agency for European Manufacturing Jewellery, is prepared to supply all fashionable and wholesale dealers with the newest patterns. We also noticed a large quantity of new and elegant jewellery, for sale at low prices. These newly-imported articles are to be disposed of on a new principle, giving good advantages to purchasers, and affording extensive employment to agents.—Evening Express, Aug. 5, 1864. Arundale & Co.'s arrangement, the advantages must be on the side of the customer, for he obtains every thing for gain, and pays nothing except by issue. He knows what he will get for his dollar beforehand, and if we may judge by the rest of his business.—New York Weekly News, Aug. 8, 1861.

Extraordinary Gift Enterprise.—The most eligible and profitable employment we have heard of for ladies is that of agent for Messrs. A. & Co.'s Grand Gift Distribution of Arundale & Co. A lady of our acquaintance has been very successful in this way, and says she finds it an easy parer, but also in doing a good turn to those to whom she sells tickets, as all who purchase from us are in the ring columns. Gentlemen can also be thus employed.—Saturday Evening Mail, Aug. 6, 1864.

In our columns the reader will find an advertisement of Arundale & Co.'s Grand Gift Distribution of valuable jewellery and silver-ware. In payment of that advertisement we have received several of the jewellery articles, and we are warranted in saying that, both in finish and workmanship, they appear to exceed what is usually furnished out to be just what they had been represented.—True Democrat, Aug. 12, 1864.

The British Whig of Kingston, C. W., says, Nov. 25, 1864, one of our subscribers has drawn an article from Arundale & Co., and by request brought some of the articles, such as Jewellery, Watches, &c., with him for inspection, and without hesitation we can state that both and in all the dealings we have had with the amount of cost to the recipients, and some of them are.

ARRANDALE & CO., Manufacturers' Agents,
No. 187 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Announce that all the above list will be sold for $1 each for One Dollar each.

In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war in America, the agents of the extensive firm of Messrs. Valentine Jewellery, originally intended for the English markets, have been sent over to this country, and the goods MUST BE SOLD AT ANY SACRIFICE!

Under these circumstances, ARUNDALE & CO., acting as Agents for the principal European Manufacturers, are enabled to open a Grand Gift Distribution, on the following regulations:

Certificates, stating what prize articles are first put into envelopes, sealed up and mixed; and when ordered, are taken promiscuously from the mass, and sent out, thus giving all a fair chance.

On receipt of 25 cents, you will see what you are to have, and then it is at your option to send us One Dollar and take the article or not, as you please. You may obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any one of the articles we name for the price.

Send 25 Cents for Certificate.

In all transactions by mail, we will charge for forwarding the Certificate, paying postage and doing the business. 27 certificates, which must be enclosed with the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty five for $10, and a hundred for $15.

Agents.—We want agents in every regiment, and in every town and county in the country, and those acting as such will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered for them, provided their remittance amounts to $1 or more. Agents will receive 25 cents for each Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage Stamps.

CAUTION

THE AMERICAN WATCH CO.

In having come to our knowledge that imitations of the American Watch have been put upon the market in great abundance, and by their other resemblances to injure the reputation of our genuine products, to protect our own interests and the public from imposition, we again publish the trade marks by which our Watches may invariably be known.

We manufacture four styles of Watches.

The name has no name

"APPLETON, TRACY & CO., Waltham, Mass.," engraved on the inside plate.

The second has the name

"APPLETON, TRACY & CO., Waltham, Mass.," engraved on the plate.

The THIRD has the name

"P. S. BARTLETT, Waltham, Mass.," engraved on the inside plate.

All the above styles have the name American Watch Co. painted on the dial, and are warranted in every respect.

The FOURTH has the name

"WM. ELLERY, Boston, Mass.," engraved on the inside plate, and is warranted on the dial.

All the above-described Watches are made of various sizes, and are sold in gold or silver cases, as may be required.

It is hardly possible for us to accurately describe the numerous imitations to which we have alluded. They are usually inscribed with names so nearly approaching our own as to escape the observation of the unaccustomed buyer. Some are represented as made by the "Union Watch Co., of Boston, Mass."—no such company existing. Some are named the "Solid's Watch," to be sold as our Fourth or Mr. Ellery style—usually known as the "Soldier's Watch;" others are named the "Appleton Watch Co.;" others the "P. S. Bartley;" instead of our P. S. Bartlett, besides many varieties named in such a manner as to convey the idea that they are the veritable productions of the American Watch Company.

A little attention on the part of the buyers will protect them from gross imposition.

ARCANA WATCH.

An Elegant Novelty in Watches.

The case of this watch are an entirely new invention, composed of six different metals combined, rolled together and planished, producing an exact imitation of the coral gold, called Arcana, which will always keep its color. They are as beautiful and durable as solid gold, and are offered at one-eighth the cost. The case is beautifully designed, with Panel and Shield for name, with Patent Push Pin, and engraved in the centre of the celebrated Gold Hunting Levers, and are really handsomer and prettier, and are worth a hundred dollars gold, as to daily detention. The movement is manufactured by the well-known St. John Watch Company of Europe, and are superbly finished, having engraved plates, finely carved bridges, adjusting regulator, with gold balance, and the improved ruby jewelled action, with fine dial and delicate hands, and is warranted a good timekeeper. These watches are of three different sizes, the smallest being for ladies, and are all Hunting Cases. A case of six will be sent by mail or Express for $18. A single one can be obtained at Samuel Colgate's $25, will readily sell for three times their cost. We are the sole agents for this watch in the United States, and none are genuine which do not bear our Trade Mark.

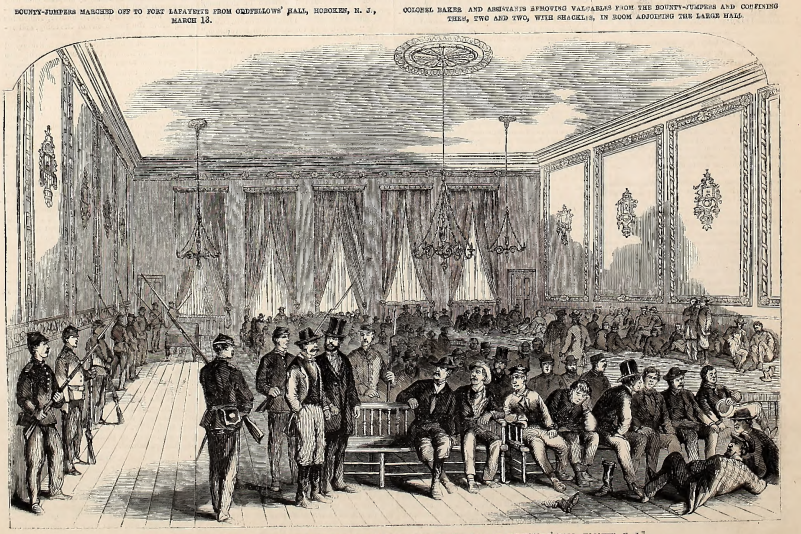
FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 496—Vol. XX.] NEW YORK, APRIL 1, 1865. [Price 10 Cents. $4 00 Yearly. 10 Weeks $1 00.

Gold and Prices.



Under the influence of the military successes at home, and the better appreciation of the power and resources of our country abroad, the premium on gold has fallen 70 per cent. since the 1st of January. In other words, gold is quoted as against currency at 160 or thereabouts, instead of 230 and over, as it was ninety days ago. This is a rapid and unexpected advance towards the specie standard, and must have a powerful effect on prices, which have been outrageously inflated under the depreciation of the currency—a depreciation mainly created by disloyal and disaffected persons, a large part of them foreigners, and through speculative operations in William and Wall streets. The fact that duties are payable in gold has been made the pretext for most extravagant advances in the prices of foreign articles; that is to say, an advance of ten per cent. in gold was made the occasion of an appreciation of from twenty to thirty per cent. in prices. The breakdown of the system through which gold was kept up brings with it, or ought to do so, a corresponding decline in the prices of all articles that are bought and sold. Those shopkeepers or dealers who attempt to hold out will lose their customers, and secure their own ruin. Under a decline of one-third in the price of gold, all commodities, and especially imported ones, must come down proportionably. People will not buy at the old rates; they will prefer to leave dealers to the companionship of their deserted counters, rather than pay old, extravagant and panic prices for articles not absolutely necessary. It is the intention of the new Secretary of the Treasury to approximate the national currency to gold, and to effect a speedy return to specie payments. In this he is greatly favored by circumstances. The absorption of legal tenders in popular loans is going on, and has been going on for a long time at the rate of more than four millions daily, and most of the old banks of issue are coming into the National Banking System, withdrawing their circulation, and replacing it with U. S. notes. There is no over-issue of currency, or if there has been the operations of existing causes will soon reduce the volume within proper limits, and there will remain no more than may be necessary for the ordinary transactions of business, and this means substantially a return to specie payments.

We repeat, therefore, prices must come down, and prudent and far-seeing people will buy nothing beyond what is absolutely requisite, until dealers adapt themselves to the altered and more favorable condition of affairs. Traders who wish to do business will reduce their prices pari passu with the decline in gold, instead of being obliged to make no sales in the interval, and come down with a crash when gold is at 120, where it soon will be.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Almanac for 1865 is the best work of its kind ever published, both for the variety and quality of its illustrations and the valuable nature of the reading matter, consisting of statistics and information indispensable to all classes. In addition to over 60 splendid engravings of general subjects, it contains four full-page portraits of Gen. Grant, Sherman, Sheridan and Farragut. Price 25 cents, with exceptional terms.

N.B.—As only a few copies remain unsold, and as the will not be printed, orders should be sent without delay to 537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Illustrated Almanac for 1865.—It is the only work of the kind ever published, containing over 75 illustrations of great variety and beauty, besides a splendid steel portrait and fac-simile of Mrs. President Lincoln and Mrs. Gen. Mcclellan, and a graphic history of the Rebellion to date. The reading matter is of the utmost importance to ladies, whether in or out of doors, in the country or the city. In a word, it is a complete Lady's Manual. Price, in ornamental cover, 25 cents.

N.B.—As this valuable work will not be reprinted, and as only a few copies remain unsold, orders should be sent forthwith to FRANK LESLIE'S Publication Office, 537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Omnibuses and Horse Railroads.

MESSRS. PERRY DAVIS & SONS—GENTLEMEN:—I have for many years used your valuable medicine, the Pain Killer, on my horses, and can testify to its efficacy in curing Galls, Sprains, Bruises, Cuts, Cramps, Weak Joints, Rheumatism, Swellings, Colic, &c., &c.

I have had a number of witnesses to the Pain Killer, and therefore recommend it to the public as the best remedy for horse flesh yet discovered. No farmer or owner of horses should be without it constantly on hand. I have had over forty horses in constant use, in the omnibus business, and never known it to fail in any case where I have used it.

Great Facts.

We are now in the fourth year of our great civil war, and yet volunteering goes on at the rate of 3,000 soldiers a-day, or over 1,000,000 per annum. To support this army in the field, the people of the United States are taking up the burden of the Government at the rate of over $5,000,000 a-day, or $1,410,000,000 per annum.

If anything were necessary to be added to these great and significant facts, we might repeat what everybody knows, namely, that labor was never so well rewarded, enterprise never more active, and all the elements of wealth and prosperity never more vigorous than at this moment.

Since the war commenced petroleum, or rather its sources and uses have been discovered, and it has added to the exportable valve of the country an amount of wealth almost if not quite equal to the gold product of California.

At this moment the export of gold to Europe has absolutely ceased; exchange is below par, and any balance of trade there might be against us is more than compensated by the European demand for American securities.

This year has shown a fourfold increase in emigration from Europe, made up of a more intelligent and better-to-do class of men than ever came into the country within a corresponding period.

The war has given us a national currency, uniform over a country larger than all Europe, and secured by the whole credit and the entire resources of the nation.

The war has given us a navy of over 600 of the fleetest, best armed, and most effective vessels that ever floated on the ocean, manned by able and experienced officers and sailors, accustomed to the reality of naval war, and no brave as they are skilful.

It has given us, what with men in the field or those who have seen service, and ready to take up arms again in case of necessity, 2,000,000 of soldiers.

It has given us 4,000,000 of grateful citizens, before slaves, to lend to competitive industry, and to the swindling strength of the country, a honest backbone of 4,000,000 of good men.

It has made us a nation free in fact as well as in theory, and redeemed us from the well-deserved sneers and contumely of mankind.

It has vindicated the technical law, the gospel, and the doctrines of the Declaration of Independence.

THE military situation of the country is more favorable than at any previous period. Sherman has penetrated into North Carolina, and was, at last accounts, within striking distance of Fort Fear river, at the head of navigation in that stream, and, consequently, in communication with the sea and with the fleet of Gen. Terry at Wilmington. He is in a position to effect a junction with Schofield, marching westward from Newbern, and from that point to strike at Raleigh, the capital of North Carolina, or at Goldsborough, the great railway centre of that State, distant about fifty miles from Raleigh. The wreck mend, and forcing back the troops of Hardee, Hoke, Beauregard and Johnston on the best rebel stronghold. Should this movement be made, or submit to be shut up with Lee in Richmond, to await the sure result of a siege in a city already woefully deficient in supplies. A great battle takes place—and if a battle takes place at all it must be a great one—Sherman will not only have in his own force a splendid army, but will have on the way through the very heart of the Confederacy, but he will also have the forces which operated under Gilmore at Charleston, and under Terry at Wilmington, and those which, under Schofield, defeated Hoke a few days ago at Kinston. Opposed to him will be the rebel generals of Sherman, Charleston and Wilmington, a portion probably of the into army under Hood, with such reinforcements as they can gather together. It is possible that these may foot up in numbers equal to the army under Sherman, but in all other respects they will be greatly inferior. Sherman's army is compact, well ordered, accustomed to victory, and made up of soldiers who have a thorough knowledge of their profession. That opposed to it is made up of ill-assorted, discontented fragments, without any leader having the prestige of success, and of great personal popularity. The result of a battle, therefore, if the numerical odds are not greatly against the Union army, can only be victory.

The only dancer to be apprehended, and that we may be sure Gen. Grant thoroughly appreciates it, is that Lee, with the remnant of the Army and secret depletion of Richmond, Lee may be able to so heavily strengthen Johnston, so as to make him able to defeat Sherman by overwhelming numbers. Such a movement, however, cannot be made easily nor without the knowledge of the Lieutenant-General. He is ready to sweep down on Richmond at a moment's warning, and to follow up its garrison closely wherever it may go. Besides, such a movement could not, at all, must be made soon; and before Sheridan cuts the Danville railway, which, since his destruction of that to Lynchburg, is the only one left, leading from Richmond.

The whole available forces of the rebellion are now concentrated into Central North Carolina and Eastern Virginia, between Sherman and Grant, and with Thomas moving from Tennessee on their left flank for Grant's support, they form a circle on the east. Here they must soon hazard a battle on which they must stake all. Should it go against them, they must evacuate instantly and for ever lost. None know it better than the rebel leaders, and we may be sure they will fight with the energy of despair. The loyal people of the nation await the issue, not without concern, but with an abiding faith in the justice of their cause and in the strength and devotion of their soldiers, who also know the vastness of the stake for which they are called to fight.

In Gerrit Smith, Wendell Phillips, or Mr. Lloyd Garrison had been appointed a committee of three to draw up, on behalf of the rebel Congress, a bill for the employment of slaves in the Southern army, they could not have devised one better adapted to defeat the objects of the South, or enhance the prospects of the North, than that which has just been adopted by the Solons of Richmond. It provides that for the purpose of "securing the independence and preserving the institutions of the Confederate States," the General-in-Chief may accept from the owners of slaves such number of negroes as he may deem expedient, and place them in the army, "where they shall receive the same clothing, rations and compensation as are allowed to other troops." The essential point of the measure consists in the 5th and closing section, which provides "that nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize a change in the relations of the Confederate States we "said slaves" Relating to "preserve the institutions of the Confederate States," the objects of which, the "emancipation," in fact, is slavery! What a glorious consolation for our often fellow-citizen from Africa, when bleeding and dying on the battlefield, to reflect that he has preserved the gyves on the wrists of his wife and children! What an inspiration in the charge on Yankee bayonets, the thought that every rebel will tend to strengthen the southern hold on "nigger chattels!" Let Lee hasten his African auxiliaries to the field; we can afford to fight them. Every rebel—as Sherman offered Hood when he commenced his famous march for the Ohio river.

The rebel Congress was ready to adjourn a few days ago, but Alexander Davis sent on a message requesting the members to wait a "little longer," without assigning any special reason. A few members of the Congress had left Richmond; we presume the other three-fifths (members from Kentucky, Missouri, Arkansas, Tennessee and Louisiana), had no place to go to, were sufficiently enough to remain. To return to their constituents (heaven save the mark!) would be somewhat hazardous. The object of the arrest of Foster in keeping them together may have been to give to their surrender and his own a mole-dramatic dignity. Maybe he is willing to accept the gracious of the Evening Post:

"What, then, is the object of the mysterious communication? We do not know, of course, but we can give a Yankee guess, which is sometimes almost as good as knowing. The object is to open a new game of cards for Richmond—for Grant, Sherman, Sheridan and Schofield to shuffle, cut and deal. The game will be played thus: first, by stealing off in the night to some point in the lower Shenandoah Valley to pursue Early; second, to risk a big battle, in which, by an inexplicable blunder, Lee will be left in command; and third, to blow their arms on the promise of some other employment under the new rule of a new government. We see no other course for them, and we believe that it is the smartest and most effective that the Congress is asked to remain and deliberate."

THE Minister of Finance of Canada has submitted to Parliament the estimates for the current year, including $1,600,000 for the permanent defence of Canada. This is either one million or two title; and the "defences"—against whom are they to be erected? Against the United States? Why, this only ask "what is a hatchet in a bear's maw?"

To the popular mind, says the Historical Magazine, Arnold is the one sole traitor of the Revolution, who stands in solitary grandeur as the arch apostate from the cause of American freedom. Yet there were many in the civil and military service of the new Government who from one motive or another abandoned its cause and took service under the Crown. A few successes would perhaps have increased the number, as perhaps there were not a few who carried American commissions and British protection in the same pocket, ready to use either as an emergency.

Among the "Loyalists of the American Revolution," we find

William Cunningham (Bloody Bill, of South Carolina, was an officer on the Wig side in 1776, joined the British cause, and distinguished the greatest cruelty, killing no less than 35 persons in cold blood.

John Gleadow Scott, of Georgia, who was the chairman of the Committee of Safety of Savannah, and a Rebel Will, of South Carolina, commanded a small band which unconditionally surrendered to the Cherokees. The whole party was subsequently to become lieutenants in the King's Rangers, and was taken in 1779 at Charleston.

Col. Daykyns, of the New Jersey militia, took the oath of allegiance in 1776.

Capt. John Purvis, member of the Provincial Congress of South Carolina, joined the King's Rangers, a Tory troop in 1778.

Allan Cameron, of Georgia, member of the Continental Congress, finally fled to the enemy.

Col. Isaac Hayne, of South Carolina, at first zealous on the Whig side, but deserted and was the second in South Carolina to join them. He was captured, kept in prison for five years and died soon after.

Major Andrew Wilkinson, of South Carolina, was an active officer in 1776, when he submitted to the British and became so active in the cause of the Crown that he was hung as a traitor by the Americans. He was captured by Marion, and this cost the latter his life.

Capt. Andrew Carney, of Georgia, first sold his own and stolen cattle to the English, and then deserved to them.

To understand how much and what kind of a "blessing in disguise" the capture of Wilmington proved to be, see the statistics of Railway Commerce running to that port published in the Manchester (Eng.) Examiner. For one year, ending December 31, 1864, the value of ships and cargoes going to Wilmington were $66,000,000. The total number of vessels which ran the blockade for fifteen months, from October 1, 1863, to December 31, 1864, was 337, with a value in ships of $30,000,000, and of carrying an enormous number, of $40,000,000. Now this illicit trade as wholly stopped, the South pronounces the cessation a blessing; we are satisfied, and only remark that "a nigger in the woodpile, B. ?" thereby meaning John, whose surname is Bull.

Our readers will remember that Senator Wigfall, of Texas, in the debates preceding Secession, called the Government of the United States "a one-horse concern." Since the Virginia Legislature has declared for the policy of arming negroes, Wigfall has shocked all the proprieties of the Old Dominion by applying the same elegant phrase to that august body. If we may believe the Richmond Sentinel, his speech was generally "violent, unpatriotic and censurable in the highest degree," and the Governor's message, when read, poured on his bitterness on the President, and demanded that he and the Vice-President should resign."

Our readers will hardly credit the fact that the following paragraph appeared in a London paper less than a month ago:

"To take Wilmington, or Charleston, or Mobile will require the advance of an army larger than the combined forces of Grant, Sherman, and Lee. Resort is not now to be had to the chances that he can hold Wilmington and Fort Fisher from the sea."

A CORRESPONDENT brings to our notice the following lines by the Rev. Charles Wesley, which are of "NOT a Drum was Heard:"

If I have lived with those who could have died,
I might not weep for them;
But I repent, when by my side,
That those could die who need not have died,
And those who might have lived.

And still upon their face I look,
And think their souls are gone,
And still the thought I will not brook,
That I have sunk in vice.
But when I speak that dark out cast
What terror then will mould,
And now I feel, as well I may,
Dear God! my sins are many.

If thou wouldst stay, even as thou art,
All cold and all serene,
I still might love, still clasp thy heart
And where thy smiles had been!
When e'en thy cold lips all said I have
Thou seemest still my own,
But thrown a chill o'er me in thy grave,
And I am now alone.

I do not think, wherever thou art,
Thou hast congenial soul,
And I, perhaps, may seek thy heart,
In darkness still of hope,
Yet there was round thee such a dawn
Of light, that spirits were only
As dusky never could have drawn,
And I am restless.

"These lines were composed by Wolfe," continues our assertive friend, "about the same time that he said the 'would rather write those lines than take Quebec,' and although they seem to breathe the present feeling of one distracted between love and glory, and the early death both of his mistress and his hopes, they were probably written before those prospects for either blossom, when he was yet smarting for a fellowship at Ryndy College, and when his thoughts were only written to be sung to his favorite air of 'Gramaree,' for which he was much better adapted than for a Hero that Once through Time's Halls."

I feel not the memory of Wolfe so sacred, not only for his poetry but for his virtues, that I hesitate to proclaim that the above lines are a solemn humbug to myself. I have stood beside his grave, in the old churchyard, at Greenwich, and expected the ghost which I have given you.

"I may add," continues our assertion, that all Charles Wolfe's literary remains may be found in a volume published by the Rev. J. Russell, Archdeacon of Clogher, Ireland, and this book, though of moderate dimensions, contains all that can lay claim to sense and a full stretch of our hero's habit but cheapened life. VIATOR."

Summary of the War.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Gen. Sherman arrived at Fayetteville on the 12th of March, having accomplished a triumphant march South Carolina without any serious resistance, the enemy invariably flying at his approach.

On the 13th Gen. Wade Hampton's rebel cavalry suddenly attacked the Union cavalry in camp, and took them so suddenly by surprise that they had no chance for their camp. Gen. Kilpatrick escaping with difficulty; he, however, rallied his men, drove the rebels out of the camp, and recaptured all he had lost.

It was reported that Gen. Sherman had occupied Goldsboro and Raleigh, but no certain intelligence has yet come to hand. Gen. Terry has opened communication with him by sending a steamer up the Cape Fear river.

SOUTH CAROLINA AND GEORGIA.

From Charleston and Savannah our dispatches by the steamship Argo, which arrived here on the 18th, are to the 14th inst. In both cities and their vicinity, of course, there was no disturbance of the military quiet. In Charleston the Provost-Marshal's office was daily thronged with the inhabitants anxious to take the oath of allegiance. There is great scarcity of food in that city, and great numbers of the poor are threatened with starvation. Large additional forces of artillery have been found in Charleston and vicinity, sufficient to make the entire number captured by the rebels and Union forces since the 1st of April to nearly 500. Vast quantities of hidden ammunition have also recently been discovered.

VIRGINIA.

Gen. Sheridan, in a dispatch dated 15th March at the Richmond and Fredericksburg railroad crossing of the South Anna river, gives a brief account of additional stores of damage to the enemy inflicted by his cavalry in the region immediately around and north of the rebel capital. The James River canal was destroyed entirely from the canal at Goochland, and 15 miles of the Virginia Central railroad, from Tolleville to Beaver Dam station, about 20 miles, also have been utterly destroyed. Ashland and the South Anna river bridges were also destroyed. The destruction of the latter the rebels attempted to prevent, but they were soon driven off, and three pieces of artillery were captured from them.

There has been little movement in the armies before Richmond and Petersburg. In consequence of information that the rebels had undermined Fort Hell, blowing the latter city, the troops had been withdrawn to another position, from the guns, etc., being removed.

TENNESSEE.

Refugees and rebel deserters arriving in Chattanooga, says the Gazette, from the northern counties of Georgia, report a terrible state of affairs existing through that region. The whole country is swarming with gangs of marauders, composed of deserters from the rebel army and rebel citizens, who roam over the land, robbing, plundering, and even murdering defenceless women. The thieves even stoop to rob the women of their clothing and children of their shoes. Life is cheaply held, and the rights of property are disregarded.

The supposition that Longstreet's corps is already in the vicinity of Bristol is strengthened by the increased boldness of rebel movements in that quarter lately. A few days ago a yawl, containing torpedoes and other incendiary apparatus, together with a dozen rebel naval officers, was captured on the Tennessee, below Knoxville. Their mission is supposed to have been to destroy all the Government warehouses, property and railroads from Chattanooga westward.

ALABAMA.

Dispatches from Mobile say the city is strongly menaced, and Gen. Maury, the rebel commander, has warned the people to prepare for the expected attack of the national forces, and advised all non-combatants to leave. On the 9th inst. a transport with 2,000 Union troops entered the bay through Grant's Pass; 21 Union vessels were in sight of the city on the 11th, and great activity was said to prevail in the fleet. A few shots had been thrown from the vessels at both shores.

NEW BOOKS, &c.

The New York Weekly, published by Street & Smith, 11 Fulton street, is having a great sale consequent upon its publication of the exciting story, entitled "Wild Nell, the Spy," by F. S. Smith. There is always a fund of absorbing and sensational story matter in the Weekly.

"Life of Mendelssohn," published by Leypoldt, 644 Broadway. A profoundly interesting pendant to the "Letters" of the composer, issued by the same publisher. It is translated from the text of his lifelong friend, Lampadius, by W. L. Gage, and commended to the lovers of music and books by Leypoldt's faultless taste in the way of printing and binding.

From Horace Waters, 481 Broadway, we have received two songs for the piano. "A Home on the Mountain" is a very sweet ballad, words by Rev. Sidney Dyer, and music by Mrs. Parkhurst. The other is patriotic, and is called "Charleston is Ours!" It is a song and chorus, by Meitzke, and appears to contain the elements of popularity.

TOWN GOSSIP.

We have been sitting and shivering in the draft this week past. It is true, excellent Gov. Fenton promised that if we would be good boys and play nicely at recruiting, we should hear nothing more of this distasteful blast. But excellent governors are but excellent men, who may be deceived by governors-general, who may misunderstand an oracular President; and the fact was that on Wednesday, just as we were congratulating ourselves on the narrow escape we had made, we heard something ominous—the doors of the provost-marshal's office rolled apart, grating harsh thunder; and inside seemed to sit a huge dim figure of Fortune, who rolled a huge dim wheel, and then we came away.

The fact is, we were drafted; in several districts. We have decided to report ourself; and then resign.

That was a superb festival of splendor and beauty they gave us at the Academy on Tuesday night. They called it the Purim Ball. It seems that thousands of of years ago a Persian king, with a name that sounds like a sneeze, collected all the oriental beauties together for a sort of grown-up baby show; and being dazzled with the loveliness of one ineffable dark-eyed girl, changed his previous intention of marrying them all, and condensed upon her his critical despotic fancies, and held over her the sceptre of his awful favor. She turned out to be a Jewess, and gained vast advantages for her people, whom these blessings rendered "purim," or fortunate. So they celebrate her memory every year, as they did the other night; we paid $20 dollars for a ticket, and participated; we found it very purim indeed. There was a noble assembly of very beautiful women, but we could not see that richly-chiselled Hebrew profiles prevailed. We saw Deists, Atheists, Plymouth Brethren, and indeed all the most exclusive sects. The costumes and dominoes were rich beyond anything we have seen within those walls that have flushed with so many gorgeous revels; the folds of the massive stuffs, all dewy with diamonds, and glowing with every color under the sun (that is fashionable)—much more agreeable—to dance with—than any statuary we have seen, even wax statuary. We only wished Ahasuerus had been there; he would have been so utterly dashed by the thousands of conflicting temptations, that we firmly believe he would have retreated home, signed the pledge, and made it up with Vashti, all for peace.

Manager Maretzek has given two extra nights of opera to his subscribers, who are all going to remember him in their (good) wills. On Thursday Signora Carozzi-Zucchi rendered the rôle of Norma with impassioned energy and power. It has been of late years the fashion for every prima donna who was very fat to be proclaimed as the "only Norma." We remember several magnificent developments of adipose, standing upon altars with verbena around their heads, and announcing "I was Norma!"—while the critics would softly and devoutly add, "The only Norma since Grisi." Now Zucchi is merely rounded to the point of peerless symmetry, and most noble and melodious she was, breathing the Casta Diva in the moonlight, or singing her soul out over her children in that tender duel she has with Adalgisa. By-the-bye, we have not given Morensi, who took this latter part, the credit she deserves for her various agreeable reproductions. Her vivandiere beauty in "La Forza" is most satisfactory to the various young men who come expressly to see her, and her hearty, mellow contralto is always welcome, as it comes easily flowing from her round throat—more like a bird before the dawn than a singer before the critics.

Here is one of the pleasant little incidents that occur sometimes in this cosy corner devoted to chat and gossip. Just as we had retreated hither lately from the labors of a busy day, a dark-haired and graceful youth was introduced, who bowing and coloring with all the irresistible candor of boyhood, began to explain that his errand was to ask a personal and family favor. Eugene Beauharnais, when he went to ask his father's sword from the first Consul, might have worn a manner as tender and frank. He introduced himself as a member of the family of the late Gen. George P. Morris, and asked to see the portrait of that gentleman, in our paper of Oct. 6, 1860.

He sighed as he looked upon the effigy, and said, gravely: "Our family all consider this the best likeness of my father-in-law that has been made. None of the portraits show him so precisely as he looked six months before he died. Will you let me have a copy of the paper?"

It was easy to accommodate this natural filial sentiment by a little work upon the press downstairs, and our routine duties have rarely been relieved by a feeling of purer professional pleasure than was ours in distributing some proofs among the survivors of that true father, high-toned friend and stainless gentleman. The inexorable Woodman, who would not spare that hale and noble tree, is balked of half his revenge if the children it protected can feel its kindly shelter falling on them again from the shadow we have preserved.

Saint Patrick's day was celebrated in royal style, himself assisting in his most brilliant robes—in blue cope and sunny surplice, instead of the dull, gray, washed-out drapery he has usually officiated in. The anomaly of a fair day brought out all the Hibernians. The 69th and 99th regiments turned out in force, followed by a long tail of civic societies—Ancient Orders, Father Mathew Societies, Benevolent Associations, more of them than can be told. The streets through which they passed were gay with the inimitable Irish bonnet and shawl, and the gallant boys had so much flirting to attend to that they had much ado to move along through the dense ranks of sweethearts. In the evening there was a noble banquet given by the Knights of St. Patrick at the Metropolitan Hotel, as jolly as the glorious Messrs. Leland could make it, and the cheery Saint's day concluded, in a peculiarly Irish manner, at an advanced hour the next morning.

Mr. William Wheatley has found his profit in Mr. Bandmann and the higher drama. How infinitely refreshing, after a long course of modern spasmodic plays, is a draft of Shakespeare, blowing through the house like a breath from the sea! How it freshens everything! What a flavor there is in any single line!

Only say this, and a whole dead civilization breathes again, with its beautiful old stiffness and state; the actor recites his part, and however low and poor a fellow he may be, for his hour he becomes a Venetian gentleman of the 16th century, with touches upon him of the chivalric dignity or the sweet courtly wit of the time, too distinct for his worst awkwardness to wholly do away. The Shylock of Mr. Bandmann is a performance that no Shakespearean student would willingly miss; it is most scholarly, most Jewish, most intensely sympathetic. It elucidates the text with marvellous skill and minuteness; at the same time it is wholly removed from the manners of real life—it is a Shylock that could not breathe a moment outside the theatre.

At the Olympic they are still running the "Streets of New York" to abundant houses. The public have taken this drama so decidedly under their patronage that it can well afford to spare any praise from us.

The members of the opera troupe gave a fine sacred entertainment at St. Stephen's Church on Sunday night. All the principal vocalists were present, and Heller, tired of playing the fiend for six nights in the week at his mysterious Salle Diabolique, had reformed, and lent his skilful hands to the organ. Of course there was a large audience, and immense though repressed enthusiasm.

We hear of our old friend Stephen Massett away up in Connecticut, at Middletown. Jeemes Pipes seems to have found the pipe of Pan—everybody listens, and they pay the piper, too, wherever he goes.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—Several of the female rebels of Missouri who were sentenced to be banished to the South during the war by Gen. Dodge, have compromised by marrying Union soldiers, in some cases their temporary guards, and now their life guards.

—— There are now in the vast pineries of the Upper Mississippi not far from 150,000,000 feet of logs cut and ready for the spring drive.

—— A male native of Michigan is now denominated a Michigander, while his female mate is called a Michigoose.

—— Those seeking a pleasant entertainment will be gratified to learn that Mrs. Henry C. Watson will commence her poetic and dramatic recitations, with vocal illustrations, at Steinway's Rooms, during the present month.

—— A Philadelphia critic says that Mrs. John Drew follows her noble art, "as one of old, who, on the mountain crags, caught madness from a maniac's haunting eyes!" Poor woman!

—— Last year more persons were killed by railroad and steamboat accidents in this country than in any year since 1854.

—— Dr. S. G. Howe and other citizens of Boston are petitioning the Massachusetts Legislature to remove the restriction upon the admission of colored persons to theatres and other places of amusement.

—— Lyman Sibley has just been chosen clerk of the town of Barre, Mass., for the 47th time. The vote was unanimous. David T. Valentine, of this city, is another instance of a faithful officer whom successive corporations re-elect for long terms of years.

—— Agassiz's museum in Cambridge, Mass., is prosperous, full and remarkable. The trustees, in their last report, say that from the cellar to the attic, in casks, in jars, and in boxes, all arranged and labelled, the specimens are crowded together, waiting for room in which to be displayed for the purposes of instruction. Even the roof does not escape service.

—— The Pittsburg Chronicle says: "The number of barrels of oil yearly brought to this city for the past six years has been: in 1859, 7,637; in 1860, 17,161; in 1861, 94,102; in 1862, 171,174; in 1863, 175,181; in 1864, 476,939 (not inclusive of 78,320 barrels delivered in bulk outside the city limits), and already in 1865 we have had brought here 24,764, making a total of 966,958 barrels of oil brought through this city up to the 4th of March, 1865."

—— A Canada paper thus records the fluctuation of gold in New York. The price in the early part of the year 1862 was as low as 101, but on the 15th of Oct. it had risen to 137, and the year closed with the price at 133. Early in 1863, in February, just before the passage of the Gold tax bill, the highest price of the year was reached, 172; in August the lowest price, 122; the year closed with the price at 152. In 1864, the lowest price was at the beginning of the year, when it was as low as 151; the highest was in July. It is marked 284 on the 11th of July, and on the 1st 285. 1864 closed with the price a fraction above 225.

—— The deaths in New York during the past week were 478; 104 men, 86 women, 153 boys and 135 girls—an increase of 3 upon the mortality of the previous week, and of 29 as compared with the mortality of the corresponding week of 1864. Of the deceased 220 were children under 5 years of age. The mortality by the principal diseases was as follows: Consumption, 71; inflammation of the lungs, 47; infantile convulsions, 37; infantile marasmus, 25; small-pox, 25; scarlet fever, 15; typhoid fever, 9; typhus fever, 5; deaths from external causes, 23.

—— The Austin, California, Reveille says that the petroleum found south of there on Tar Creek is quite dark, and considerably different in many respects. Perhaps the first mentioned is some new product unknown to science.

—— It is a mooted question whether a hen ever lays more than one egg a day. John Wyman, Lockport, N. Y., says he obtained 12 eggs in one day from six black Spanish hens. They were fed upon soft sugar corn.

Western.—The Western papers state that the winter now happily passing away has been the severest felt for 18 years. They attribute the raids made by the Indians partly to the machinations of the rebels and to the destitution caused by the inclemency of the weather.

Southern.—The Southern papers show that they are more than ever quarrelling among themselves. The Richmond Examiner, in a pretended letter addressed to the editor, but which evidently bears the mark of having been written in their own office, attacks the rebel Congress, charging it with endeavoring to force Jeff Davis to resign; and among other things it says: "That there is a party of whipped seceders in and about Richmond cannot be denied. They are cowed and cowardly, miserable wretches, who brought the war upon the country, and would now surrender to the enemy. We have no doubt but that there was a plan on foot to force Mr. Davis to resign, and that Mr. Stephens had consented to resign, so that Mr. Hunter, as President of the Senate, would become President. The plan, we hope and believe, has miscarried. At any rate, the conspirators may understand that, if they should succeed, they will have placed a barren sceptre in their gripe, thence to be wrenched by an unlineal hand, no son of theirs succeeding. Robert E. Lee, by and with the consent of the army and the people, will grasp the sceptre they may wrench from the hands of Mr. Davis, and wield it for the safety and security of his country's liberty and independence."

The Richmond Despatch has an article urging the people to send contributions to feed the army, and adds; "Gov. Vance has issued an appeal to the people of North Carolina, calling for donations, sales or loans of supplies for the rebel army. He states that in consequence of interruption to our railroad communication by recent movements of the enemy, the subsistence of Gen. Lee's army has become jeopardized. For at least a few months that army will have to rely for subsistence upon North Carolina and Virginia alone. I am informed by the commissary department that the usual methods of collecting supplies will be insufficient for the purpose."

—— A single day's issue of the Memphis Bulletin contains the following specimen of Southern barbarism: Two white men hung, two negroes hung, one Union man murdered, two negroes whipped almost to death, a mulatto man whipped to death and his master's house robbed, an unknown number of men carried off for conscripts, more negroes whipped, hundreds of bales of cotton burned, and robberies too numerous to mention.

Military.—Volunteer officers who remain in the service at the close of the war will receive three months' pay upon being mustered out of the service.

—— It is said that Gen. Grant ordered Gen. Rosecrans to be removed from command, in consequence of his delay in joining Gen. Thomas.

—— The 13th and 16th army corps having been reorganized by Maj.-Gen. Canby, by direction of the President, Maj.-Gen. Gordon Granger is assigned to the command of the former, and Maj.-Gen. A. J. Smith to the latter, their assignments to date from Feb. 18.

—— The director of the Leipsic Theatre is about to try a bold experiment. Between the present time and June the whole cycle of Shakespeare's historical plays, from "Richard II." to "Richard III.," will be put upon the stage in chronological succession.

—— "Enoch Arden" has been translated into German and French. The German translation is said to be good, but the French has not hit the spirit and pure idiom of the original. It has turned out to be the most lucrative, in point of pecuniary return, of all Mr. Tennyson's beautiful productions.

—— The London Athenæum says that "Ladies' heroes may be ranged in two principal divisions—gloomy mesmerisers, who compel pretty women to marry them by the power of the eye; and irreclaimable scamps, with whom all the fair sex fall in love from their own delightful instinct.

—— During the recent carnival in Italy Verdi's "Ballo in Maschera" was the opening opera at eleven theatres; "Traviata" at five; "Lombardi" at four; "Favorita" at nine; "Trovatore" at three; "Lucie" at seven; and Pedrotti's "Tutti in Maschera," one of the most charming little operas ever written, and which seems to enjoy a popularity almost equal to that of "Un Ballo in Maschera," at seven. Four years ago fifteen theatres opened with "Trovatore" and twenty-three with "Traviata."

Foreign.—The trade returns of England show that the exports of Great Britain last year were $800,000,000, and its imports $1,000,000,000. If the balance of trade theory is true, Great Britain is going to ruin at the rate of $200,000,000. For several years past the balance against England has averaged over $150,000,000 per annum.

—— The last number of the Popular Science Review contains an article by Baron Liebig, drawing attention to the feasibility of producing a substitute for human milk. The Lancet describes the baron's process as one "for preparing an artificial liquid equal in nutritive value to the milk of the mother." Strange to say, malt is one of the ingredients of the new pabulum.

—— The Chamber of Deputies of the Kingdom of Wurtemberg has just pronounced in favor of the abolition of capital punishment by 56 votes against 27.

—— No new theatre will be licensed in England unless the means of egress are such as to secure the safety of the audience. The idea is worthy of imitation in New York.

SPRING BONNETS.

As according to Tennyson, "In the spring a young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love;" so, in that vernal and gushing season, does a young maid's fancy lightly turn to thoughts of bonnets. A privilege not accorded to mortals in general has this week been ours; we have peeped at the glories reserved for Opening Day, and garnered up in Mrs. Rellings's Boudoir of Millinery, No. 318 Canal street. Limited space compels us to merely suggest the beauties of a few where all are lovely. White chip bonnet with crystals; trimmings of scarlet geraniums and white lilies of the valley, white ribbon and black lace. Bonnet of white tulle, puffed; trimmed with violets and ribbon of the same color. Lavender crêpe bonnet, with pink roses, white blonde lace and strings to match the crêpe. White crêpe, puffed with cherries, myrtle leaves, and white lilies of the valley. White chip bonnet, with pale mauve flowers and ribbon; strings trimmed with white lace and lilies of the valley. Even in these days of petroleum and greenbacks it will be a further inducement for ladies to know that they can buy their bonnets from Madame Rellings at 26 per cent. less than at any other establishment of equal elegance in the city.

GREAT HAUL OF BOUNTY JUMPERS AND BOUNTY BROKERS

In New Jersey.

Saturday, March 11, will be ever memorable in the annals of rascality, since on that day Col. Baker sprung a mine upon them which resulted in the capture of 27 bounty brokers, and over 200 bounty jumpers.
